Mr. President, I have about concluded what I had to say, except that I want to make this suggestion: I find myself thoroughly in accord, not only with the statement of the law made by the Senator from Iowa this morning, but also with his views about individual and personal liberty, and the sacredness of individual and personal liberty, and the duty and obligation resting on us, as Members of the Senate, to preserve it and not to impair it. We can not and we ought not, under any circumstances or for any provocation, in any situation or for any reason, to enact any sort of legislation that will make men work involuntarily, or will tend to do it. For one I will never vote for such a proposition. For one I will never support such a propaganda, no matter where it comes from nor what the apparent necessities of the moment are. But I say to you that we can and we ought, and it seems to me that the present situation proves that we must, after once we lay the foundations for a just determination of these wage problems, provide that men shall not, in combination and in conspiracy and in concert, tie up the great transportation agencies of this country and halt commerce and industry throughout the country. I am in favor of securing to these men, by any way that can be devised, a fair and just determination of their demands for adequate pay and for reasonable labor conditions. Once we provide such a system—and I believe it will be along the lines of my suggestion whenever we come to its permanent solution—then I would thoroughly favor the enactment of a law making it criminal for any number of men to conspire to impair or destroy the effectiveness or the efficiency of the great interstate transportation agencies.

Upon these great transportation agencies not only do the industries, the businesses, and the enterprises of the country rest, but also the very life of the country seems to be bound up in their constant and in their regular action. It is not to be permitted in this country that either a lot of selfish capitalists who are striving to pay dividends on watered stocks or to pay exorbitant salaries to the heads of great railroad systems, or a lot of men who are already well paid, in order to get higher pay, should be permitted to halt the wheels of human progress in this Republic and to say to every industry, to every commerce, and to every business in this land, "You must starve and languish and perish while we settle our squabble about how much wages we are to pay, or we are to get."

It is inconceivable. The American public will not submit to it, and ought not to submit to it. These men on both sides, capitalists and laboring men, ought to be conservative and ought to have some thought about somebody's interests besides their own. Unless they will do it, unless they do do it, they will find aroused against them a public sentiment in this country so great that whichever side offends against it will go to eternal ruin.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator, he would give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix wages, and then he would make it a criminal offense to strike as against those wages so fixed?

Mr. HARDWICK. After they were once determined, yes, if by a "strike" the Senator means a conspiracy or concerted action to prevent the operation of the railroads.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator conceive of any constitutional difficulty in the way of that?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; because I would not make it unlawful for any individual who was dissatisfied with either the scale of wages fixed by the commission or the terms and conditions of employment prescribed by them to quit as an individual; but what I would make unlawful would be a conspiracy to stop the operation of the great agencies of interstate commerce, just on the same lines that we made it unlawful—and it is now unlawful—to interfere with the postal service of the country, for instance.

Mr. BORAH. That would result in one of two things, I should think: Either the absolute destruction of unionism in connection with the railway system or else compulsory service.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; neither. Well, I will take that back in part. I think perhaps there would be very little need for union-labor organizations among railroad employees if that were done. There might be still a great field in which these organizations might work—the presentation of their cases, the arraying of the facts that support their contention—before this commission, or in case of an appeal to the courts on constitutional grounds, as the railroads now have such appeal to the courts of the land, they might operate in that way. But they certainly would have no right, under my view of what ought to be done, to cooperate in order to bring about a strike on these great interstate railroads, and I do not think they ought to have such right.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator what he thinks of passing a law, such as he has outlined, giving the authority to fix salaries, wages, and so forth, and then stopping right there, without trying to legislate on the question of strikes or lockouts or anything of the kind? Does he not think the result of that would be, with wages so fixed, that there would be no attempt to strike?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am inclined to think the Senator is right, and but for the awful situation that appears to confront us now I never would have thought of this other proposition. But think of the situation we are in now! Why, the country is notified that, beginning at 7 o'clock on the morning of September 4, it is proposed to tie up these great agencies of interstate commerce and to suspend their operation throughout the country. Now, once we established a system of the kind that I have indicated, and once we committed to this commission the full jurisdiction over this question and the exclusive right to settle what these wages and hours and terms of employment were to be, I do not believe we would need the other law. I do not believe it would ever become necessary, practically speaking, to have recourse to it. But does not the Senator agree with me that if once we have done that, and a situation like that which confronts us at present were to recur, the Republic itself, the people themselves, the business, the industry of this country, ought to have some way of protecting itself against a suspension of all railway traffic?

Mr. NORRIS. One objection that strikes me now to legislating so far and going so far on this question is that it would take too long. The difficulty would be that we would get into trouble before we got through legislating. Then, in addition to that, the Senator agrees with me, as I understand, that there probably would be no use for that kind of a law, anyway. The consideration in favor of the other proposition is that it would not be much longer than your finger; it would be short, and might be passed speedily, if Congress should be in favor of it, of course.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may be right, so far as the present situation is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. And then it would have the effect, as I understand, of practically fixing by law every one of these salaries. It would be the same as though Congress itself legislated and fixed every one of them by law.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is in favor of that sort of a proposition himself, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, it strikes me that I would be. I have not given the subject the most profound thought, however.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have already taken up more time than I intended. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is ready to proceed with his bill, so I yield the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I should like to say a word or two with reference to the position taken by my friend the Senator from Georgia.

I can not imagine anything that would be more calculated to offend every friend of free institutions than the passage of legislation looking to the achievement of the end that seems to be sought by the Senator from Georgia. I can not sit here in silence and by my silence appear to give assent to the startling proposal that he has made. I am willing to go along with him about as far as was suggested by the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I think perhaps it would be in the interest of the public, in the interest of the men, and in the interest of the railroads, if the Interstate Commerce Commission were clothed with the power to say what, in its opinion—all the circumstances of the case being taken into consideration—were reasonable rates of wages, reasonable hours of labor, and reasonable conditions of service.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator a question, because I do not think we are very far apart. Suppose we did that, and then we were confronted by precisely the situation that confronts us to-day, would the Senator be willing to take the second step I have suggested?

Mr. HUGHES. I would not. I will say to the Senator that so long as I live, and so long as I continue to enjoy the privileges of a citizen of this country, I shall never subscribe to the theory that men can be compelled to work.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator can not be permitted to put me in that situation. I do not think so, either, and I so stated.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not put the Senator in any position yet. He has interrupted me before I got him placed. I am going to qualify what I have to say so that I do not think the Senator will quarrel with me at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would not quarrel with the Senator anyway.

Mr. HUGHES. I mean, then I will be glad to have him interrupt me and correct me. When I say that I will not consent to having the laboring men of this country or any other class of men in this country compelled to give up their services for rates fixed by somebody else, I mean that the Senator proposes to prohibit, along with his legislation, the only way in which they can effectively refuse to accept conditions that are imposed upon them by the Interstate Commerce Commission or other governmental authorities; namely, to confer together, or, as the Senator puts it, to conspire together and take common and joint action with reference to the propositions that are laid before them.

There is no practical difference at all in the differentiation the Senator seeks to make when he says that he would not attempt to coerce or to make subject to legislation any single individual; but that if two men working at the same desk or three men working on the same train should talk together over a decision rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and decide that it was unfair, and that they would retire from the employment of the railroad so long as that decision remained in force, they would then be subject to the criminal laws of the United States, to be indicted and convicted and punished. To attempt to do that is, in my opinion, to do just what the Senator says can not be done; that is, to compel involuntary servitude in this country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I did not state the proposition exactly in that way, and as the Senator is undertaking to give me credit for it, he had better state it as it is.

Mr. HUGHES. I am willing to have the Senator state it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not refer to a case where just two or three men get to discussing a decision and then afterwards go off and determine, each one for himself, to take separate action about it and quit; but I mean going around and organizing a strike. I mean undertaking to carry out a well-conceived plan to stop the operation of the great interstate railroads of this country, issuing formal notices, and having headquarters established, and carrying on a war with respect to the public transportation agencies of this country. That is what I mean—that 100,000,000 people have some rights as well as a few laboring people.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, the Senator is stating one extreme, and I am stating the other. They are both likely to occur. Under the Senator's proposition we might never get to the condition that we are in now; but, on the other hand, we might see thousands of train crews who operate in the way I have suggested sent to the penitentiary for operating in that way. I am willing to admit that legislation such as the Senator proposes would be likely to discourage great strikes. Not only would it be likely to discourage great strikes and great industrial wars, however, but it would discourage all sorts and forms of liberty of action.

Why, an editorial in a great newspaper or in a trade journal, in a railway brotherhood journal, to the effect that a certain decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission was unfair, and advising the men that if they submitted to it later decisions would be more unfair, and that the only way they could protect themselves would be to withdraw from their employment in that company, would, under the legislation suggested by the Senator from Georgia, bring that newspaper and anybody who acted in accordance with the suggestions made by that newspaper within the provisions of the law. I can not conceive of anything more calculated to bring trouble and disorder and misery upon the people of this country, and particularly the working people of this country, than the proposal made by the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. What does the Senator propose to do to stop the present trouble?

Mr. HUGHES. Well, that is a large order, I will say.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; it is a very simple question, though.

Mr. HUGHES. I have my own views with reference to it, and I do not mind stating them.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. HUGHES. If there had not been negotiations going on here between the President of the United States and the presidents of the great railways and the various brotherhoods, which I, for one, and I know the Senator from Georgia also hoped would be productive of some solution that would prevent this great calamity from coming upon the country, and if it had not been for the fact that any attempt of mine might have been misconstrued or misunderstood, and perhaps might have worked harm where I would have intended that it should work good, I would have introduced in this body, and I trust that somebody who is charged with that legislation more particularly than I am, will introduce in this body a measure declaring that so far as the Government and the railroads of the United States are concerned an eight-hour day is regarded as in accordance with sound public sentiment and policy.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator mean actually an eight-hour day, as the word is commonly understood, or an eight-hour yardstick of pay?

Mr. HUGHES. I mean an 8-hour day, as the word is commonly understood, as the 16-hour day is understood in what is already a law of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just to elaborate that a little, then, the Senator means that after a railroad man works eight hours he is not to be allowed, except in exceptional emergencies, to work more than eight hours?

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly.

Mr. HARDWICK. All the men are against that.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, I do not know. Of course, the Senator was asking me what I would do in this emergency. He did not ask me what I would do to please the men.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no. I did not mean that the Senator ought to follow that remark, but I say he would not satisfy either side.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not suppose any solution that we will arrive at will satisfy either side. Certainly none will satisfy both sides; and if I had it in my power to satisfy one side or the other, or to do what I would like to do in the premises, I might do something other than I have suggested. But it does seem to me that one way out of this difficulty, a less drastic way than that suggested by the Senator from Georgia, and one that would, at least, remove one bone of contention, is to do what it seems to me we are completely authorized and empowered by the Constitution to do, namely, to prescribe what we regard, if we do regard it, as a fair standard of hours of labor upon the railroads of the country.

I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. It shows that he has given a great deal of sympathetic thought and study to this whole problem. Many of the suggestions that he has made, it seems to me, will repay the study of the Members of this body; and out of the seeds he has sown there may come a solution of this very embarrassing problem.

I do not see why partial application of one of the statutes to which he referred might not be made. I do not see why it is outside of the bounds of reason to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other specially appointed commission could be clothed by law with the power to fix rates and conditions of employment upon the railroads of the country, and then that every organization which had confidence in the personnel of that commission and which wanted to avoid these occasional disturbances and crises might voluntarily subject itself to the rule of that tribunal; and I do not see why railroad organizations also seeking to avoid these disturbances might not voluntarily submit themselves to this tribunal. Then there would be no occasion for strikes, disturbances, or disorder of any kind. There would be constantly going on between the railroads who had so submitted themselves and the organizations who had so submitted themselves a process of adjustment and understanding which would work out for the benefit of all the people of the United States. That plan was suggested by some one of the statutes to which the Senator referred this morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has indicated what he would do with reference to one feature of the dispute, namely, the eight-hour-day system. Would the Senator have any objection to telling us what he would do with reference to the extra cost it would require to operate the trains for interstate commerce, and also with reference to the wages that would be dependent upon the eight-hour system? Does the Senator mean that he would have the same wages for the 8 hours that these men are now receiving for 10 hours; or, after establishing the number of hours that each trainman should work, would he leave the other question, as to what the wages should be and what the excess of time should be, to arbitration; or how would he settle that question?

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator wants to know what my personal views on the subject are, I will say that there may be an isolated instance here and there—I have heard them cited—but in the main I am of the opinion that the railroad men are not now receiving more than they are entitled to, and they are not receiving now more than, on the average, is necessary for them in order that they may live as we would like to have them live and as we would like to have everybody who toils in this country live. Without further information on the subject than I have, I would not subscribe to any policy that would in its application cause wages for 8 hours to be reduced below what is now paid for 10 hours.

But that is a matter of detail. It seems to me what I think about that matter makes very little difference, and what the Senator thinks about it individually makes not much more.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; possibly we might agree. I confess it may be that they should receive for 8 hours what they are now receiving for 10 hours. I am having no dispute with the Senator upon that question; but if they do that, then there is a wide difference in the matter of cost of transportation, and I want to know what we are going to do with the question of the extra pay for the hours in addition to the eight hours. How would we settle that proposition?

Mr. HUGHES. I suppose the Senator wants me to admit, and I hasten to admit it, that the increase of wages must be paid by the general public, and in many instances it must be paid by men who can not as well afford to pay it as those for whom we are demanding the increase. That is true. I do not attempt——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator does not quite understand my motive. It is not an attempt to elicit any kind of an admission, but to obtain the view of the Senator as to how he would settle that question, whether it would be by arbitration with the employees or whether without any arbitration it should be loaded upon the public.

Mr. HUGHES. The public pays the freight. Of course I am willing to admit that. I do not think the Senator asked the question to embarrass me. I did not mean to state that I thought the Senator was trying to embarrass me. The public, of course, will pay these increases. I have not very much sympathy with the idea that the shippers themselves are going down into their pockets to pay the increased rates that may follow the granting of the demands of the brotherhood. That does not necessarily follow. If the statements of the brotherhood publicly and privately made are true an increase of freight rates will not be necessary to meet their demand or to meet even greater demands than they are making. It is alleged in their behalf that during the last 10 years the length and the weight of the freight trains have been tremendously increased; and not only that, but they say that the weight of the trains and the length of them have increased to such an extent by reason of the progress that has been made in the construction of more powerful locomotives that an ordinary run, which they could make in 8 or 10 hours, now takes them 10 and 12; that the railroads are making infinitely more money from their labors than they were making 10 years ago, and that there has been no consequent increase to them, and the investigation may very well show that there is no necessity for any increase of freight rates.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the Senator how long he anticipates it will require to consider all the matters relating to this subject so that we may with some degree of wisdom pass legislation?

Mr. HUGHES. I hope the Senator will not ask me to answer that question.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason why I ask the question is because it is suggested that after hearings of a few hours legislation may be adopted by Saturday of this week. Does the Senator contemplate any such activity as that or any such haste as that?

Mr. HUGHES. I think if there is important legislation we can pass to prevent the strike we should pass it, even though we may make mistakes in passing it; they can afterwards be rectified; but the fundamental and pressing thing now is to legislate in such a way as to prevent this strike, if we can.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the Senator think we can pass legislation on this great subject after suitable investigation this week?

Mr. HUGHES. I think so; at least, I am ready to try it. I hope the strike will not be precipitated or be in progress without any attempt having been made by Congress to avert it.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly we could pass legislation in an hour, but what kind of legislation would it be?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator does not want me to answer that question, of course. But I rose primarily for the purpose of dissenting from the position taken by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. I was in the lower House when the discussion was at fever heat in reference to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to lay rates. For a long time that commission had the power only to suggest rates; or, at least, its power was in some way limited, and it did not have the full power it now enjoys with reference to making and laying a rate, which remains as laid unless it is proved to be unreasonable. When the United States Government took that step and went to a railroad, private property privately owned, and said to the man or the group of individuals who owned it, "You shall not charge more than a certain amount for the service you render," they took the first step in the direction of governmental ownership. In my opinion, they not only took the first step, but they took a step which made the subsequent steps absolutely inevitable.

If that is so, and a great many men in this Chamber think it is so, and a great many people in the United States think it is so, although they do not look upon the consummation with any degree of pleasure, then what becomes of the proposition that we are to go to a man who toils with his hands and say to him that he shall charge no more than a certain amount for the service that he renders? If that brought us to a condition which amounts to the absolute ownership of railroads, what condition will we come to with reference to the man to whom we do the same thing? In other words, we say to the railroad corporation that it shall not charge above a certain amount of money for a certain service. Are you going to limit the American citizen and say to him he shall not charge more than a certain amount of money? That is governmental ownership in the case of corporations. Where is it going to lead us in the case of the individual?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will yield to me a moment, I want to say for myself, as the question of wage has been brought up here, perhaps my views are pretty well known. No question is ever settled, as was said by an illustrious man some years ago, until it is settled right.

Mr. HUGHES. I simply want to say that I yield the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. This will be an ever-recurring question in this country until it is settled right, and I believe the only right solution of the question is the Government ownership of railroads. I recall that 25 or 30 years ago, when I ventured to assert that in my little Commonwealth it was thought to be rank heresy, and I was almost branded as a lunatic; but I pleaded that theory, and I believe it more and more. I believe the present unfortunate conditions demonstrate the necessity for it more and more.

The railroad owners are insisting that railroad men are richly and wrongly well paid to-day. I came across this in the Washington Times of yesterday:

RAILROADS PAY LOWEST WAGES.

A true wage index is the rate per hour. Let us compare the wages per hour of railway employees in Chicago switching districts with those of the building trades in Chicago. Any other city would do as well. Chicago comparisons are typical of them all. The standard rates of wages per hour now paid in Chicago are as follows:

Building employees.

	Cents.
Bricklayers, portable and hoisting engineers, inside wiremen, plasterers, plumbers and gas fitters, steam fitters, stonemasons, and tile layers	75.0
Lathers and marble setters	71.9
Carpenters, painters, and slate and tile roofers	70.0
Elevator constructors	68.8
Structural ironworkers	68.0
Composition roofers	65.0
Laborers in tunnels, wells, and caissons	57.5
Laborers on windlass, trench, and scaffold work	50.0
Plaster laborers	50.0
Composition roofers' helpers	45.0
Elevator constructors' helpers and tile layers' helpers	43.8
Marble setters' helpers	42.5
Excavating laborers, hod carriers, and steamfitters' helpers	40.0

Railway employees.

Locomotive engineers in Chicago railroad yards	42.5 to 44.0
Switching foremen	38.0
Switchmen	35.0
Locomotive firemen in Chicago railroad yards	27.0 to 27.5

That clearly demonstrates the fact that men in the employ of the great railways are paid less per hour than in almost any other calling, and I say advisedly to the Senate when you realize the conditions in which the average man works on a railroad train or at a switch or in a yard, you will see that his life is in continuous jeopardy every minute of the time.

We have had this same controversy in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads with reference to the Railway Mail Service. I recall the question of wage was brought up there and it impressed me very much. Since that time, in going to and from here to New York on several occasions I have made it my business to stand at the end of a mail car on a through train and see those men at work assorting the mail, tossing about almost as a ball with the sway of the car, and with a continual mental strain and a continual physical strain that must be very irksome, wearying, and tiresome, using up a man's life. I say the railroad man should be paid better than the mason who stands at the scaffold in one steady position; he should be paid better than the carpenter, better than the plasterer, or the man in almost any other calling.

I feel, of course, as we all do, that this controversy is a most unfortunate one. I realize that the time between now and September 4, when we are threatened with the railroad strike by the union, is so short a time as to make the formulation of a law as to arbitration or as to adjusting the situation almost impossible. If the strike comes, I believe the suggestion made yesterday by President Wilson, that he may draft into the service the railroad employees for the emergency, in order that the freight may be carried, in order that the mails may be carried, and in order that the general traffic affecting our Army and Navy and Government plans shall not be affected, is the wisest course that it is possible for us to pursue. But it is my prayer and my hope that this may broaden our scope and enlarge our vision, and that in the very nearby an act will pass the Congress of the United States looking to the formulation of a bill that will purchase the railroads and maintain and run them in the interest of the whole people and in justice to the laboring men, and that the purchase shall be a just and fair recompense to the parties who own the roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] one question with reference to the subject of the colloquy between him and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. The Senator from Massachusetts desired to know of the Senator of New Jersey whether he thought it was possible by Saturday to pass any legislation that might stop the strike now fixed for next Monday, the 4th instant.

Mr. President, let me make a statement before I ask the question. I have listened very carefully to the discussion this morning. I do not profess myself to know very much about this question. I have not investigated it. I do not suppose there are many Senators who have thoroughly investigated it. It is now undergoing investigation by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I suppose we will soon have from the committee a concrete proposition of legislation on the subject.

I think we will all agree that either party to a controversy similar to that now going on between the railroads and their employees may, under the so-called Newlands Act, decline to agree to arbitration under the auspices of that board, and that this declination of arbitration ends the powers and the jurisdiction of that board to effectively deal with this controversy between the carriers and their employees.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has discussed the matter in a very lucid and forceful manner. He has conceded what I take it every lawyer will concede that we have the authority under the Constitution to provide that the board created by this act, or the Interstate Commerce Commission, or some other tribunal may proceed to make investigation on behalf of the public of controversies similar to that now going on between the railroads and their employees, and that while this public investigation is proceeding by this duly constituted board of conciliation and mediation, or whatever it may be called, any lockout on the part of the railroads or any strike on the part of their employees shall be unlawful and that the court may enjoin a strike or a lockout until the investigation is completed.

I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey does he see anything in the way, as far as time is concerned, against our passing an act authorizing this board or some other tribunal to make this investigation on behalf of the public, and that until it has concluded its labors in that respect a strike or lockout shall be unlawful and subject to the restraining power of the court, and if that is done can not the strike ordered for the 4th day of September by the brotherhood be averted?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the Senator has asked me my opinion, and I will say I do not think we have any such authority. I do not think we can pass any such legislation, even under the view suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not speaking about the view suggested by the Senator from Georgia, because I was not here when he made his speech. I was talking about the view suggested by the Senator from Iowa. He expressed, as I understood him, no doubt about the right and competency of Congress to pass legislation providing that pending the investigation by this board a lockout or strike should be unlawful, and the courts empowered to enjoin either during the pendency of the investigation.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no theory on which that can be done, so far as I know. The Senator from Georgia has suggested that it was manifestly impossible to prevent any individuals from leaving their employment. He suggested that that could only be reached——

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not understand me. I was not referring to compulsory arbitration at all. I said in case the men or the railroads should decline to enter into arbitration under the Newlands Act, thereby putting an end to the authority of that board under the present law, would it not be competent for Congress to provide by additional legislation that this same board might proceed to make an investigation on behalf of the public of the controversy between the railroads and their employees, and pending that public investigation a lockout or strike should be unlawful, and the court shall have authority and power to enjoin either.

I asked the Senator if we should pass legislation to confer upon this board the power to make an investigation into this controversy and dispute as the representatives of the public and on behalf of the public, and provide that until that investigation was ended a strike or lockout should be unlawful and subject to the restraining power of the courts pending, and only pending, the investigation, would that not stop the strike ordered to begin on Monday?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is assuming a good deal in saying that it will stop the strike on Monday. He is assuming that the Government has some power to compel these men to go to work on Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not assuming that at all. I am assuming that the Government has the power, pending this investigation, if authorized by Congress, to enjoin a strike while the investigation is going on and until it is completed. That is my contention, and I think if the board be given that power the strike can be prevented for the present, and that is the essential thing to be accomplished at this time and which calls for quick action.

What I suggest is not a permanent but only temporary restraint, while the controversy is undergoing investigation, and it is not to be directed against individuals, but only against concerted action. When the investigation authorized as I have indicated—in the public interest and to ascertain the merits of the controversy—is completed, if the decision or result is adverse to the employees they could, of course, stop work. I do not deny them that right. I do not think their right in this respect should be questioned. But if they should see fit to strike, notwithstanding the result of the investigation may have been adverse to their contention, I believe that the courts should be given ample power to protect those that may take their places and to prevent by injunction or otherwise the strikers who by concerted action under these circumstances and in defiance of the adverse result of the investigation authorized and conducted on behalf of the public and to reach a just conclusion as to the merits of the quarrel or controversy between them and the railroads, from interfering by concerted action for the purpose of coercing or preventing other men from taking the places they have so voluntarily abandoned.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this matter or the very interesting questions involved in it. I think this is an appropriate time to emphasize the interest the public has in the solution of this matter and the prevention, if possible, of this strike.

We are very apt to have in mind almost entirely the interest of the railroads and the interests of the men. These interests, it is true, are very great. The railroads will suffer and the railroad men will suffer a very great deal if the strike comes off, but there are many other people who are going to suffer, even far more than they, if the strike takes effect. While there are probably a few hundred thousand men directly interested in this matter, there are millions and millions of people who will suffer if the strike comes off, and I hope that we here, as representatives not only of the railroads and the railroad employees but of all the people of the United States, will not lose sight of the interests of the great public in this matter. I trust that every power we have and that we can exert to prevent a strike will be exerted. My sympathies as between the men and the railroads are with the men, but I feel that I also owe a duty to the men, women, and children all over the country who may not be directly interested, but who will be most disastrously affected if the strike occurs.

Just as a concrete illustration of the disasters that will come to the public I want to cite this case: I received a telegram this morning from near my home. I live in a section of the State of Washington that is a great producer of fruit. The peach crop is now just coming on. They are just getting ready to ship their peaches. It is all the crop that a great many people raise, and it is the only means that they will have of supporting themselves and their families during the coming winter. They have no markets for this fruit except as they ship to the eastern market by rail.

The telegram that I received this morning stated that the freight agent at a certain point had been notified not to receive any more shipments of perishable fruit, such as peaches.

Mr. President, that is very likely the case in many other sections of the country not only with reference to the shipment of products of this kind but with reference to other products.

There are many products that you can hold, that you can keep even for months, but there are certain sections of the country like the one I have just mentioned where their products are perishable; they can not be kept very long for market, and if they can not be shipped to market it simply means poverty, distress, and suffering. These peaches are ripe. They must be shipped or kept in cold storage or they rot. Cold storage is not available to many. Stoppage of transportation means the loss of this crop. The year's work is gone. Thousands of families will face the winter with no income and threatened with all the suffering and hardship that comes from poverty. These things must be considered by us. They should be considered by both sides to this controversy. The men have called a strike for Monday morning. If it comes off, they will lose much of the sympathy they now have. If delayed, not only will they hold the sympathy of the public, but they will have its hearty commendation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, for more than 30 years my relations with the men in my State who operate railroad trains have been most intimate. They have been my personal friends at my home, my clients, my political supporters. I think I have drawn or helped prepare practically every amendment to our laws in Georgia for the past 25 years intended to better their conditions.

Yet, Mr. President, I wish I had an opportunity to warn them of the horrible blunder they are making if they bring on this strike next Monday. They do not realize the suffering they are about to cause. There has never been a strike from coast to coast in this country. There has never previously been an effort to stop transportation throughout the entire country. If they carry out this strike, and it lasts for only a few weeks or a few days, there will be suffering for want of food in many a city. The product of the farm will go to waste; the things necessary to be used in the factories will not reach them; the industries of the entire country will suspend operation.

No matter how rightful might be their claims against the managers of the roads, when the 90 per cent of the people of this country, who are disconnected with the railroads, feel the grinding heel of suffering that this strike will bring, they will not forgive the men who bring it on them. The railroad employees can not afford to bring this trouble upon their fellow citizens. They may have a just grievance against the men who own the railroads, but they have no right to bring such distress and suffering upon all the balance of their fellow citizens. I do not mean that they have not the legal right, but I mean if they will stop calmly and consider what they are doing they will not be willing to put such suffering upon the balance of their fellow citizens.

There will be children in this city who within two weeks will be suffering for the food necessary for their health; there will be thousands and thousands of women and children in the great cities of this country brought to the direst distress for the necessaries of life if this strike goes on; and the sympathy which the great body of the laboring people feel to-day for the firemen, the conductors, the trainmen, and the engineers will pass away when their wives and children are hungry for food; when the places where they work are closed. There is but one thing for the men to do. The National Congress has assumed responsibility for this question, and intends to handle it in a way that they shall have justice.

Mr. President, they should meet and call this strike off at once; postpone it at least until the lawmaking power of this land has the opportunity to consider and to pass upon it.

Let me say that the same power to make illegal a combination of two or more men with the view of bringing about a strike can make illegal the combination of two or more men cooperating to maintain a strike. I asked that question of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] when he was upon his feet, but he did not fully agree with the view I suggested. I do not think he exactly understood me. However, the strike can not be maintained without the cooperative efforts of men; and undoubtedly the cooperative efforts of men who deter other men from working upon interstate transportation routes can be made illegal and can be suppressed as a crime. This strike can be stopped by legislation if it starts, just as it can be prevented by legislation.

Mr. President, my sympathies are with the men and not with the owners of the roads. All my life I have been trying to find a way to help them. They were the first clients I had when, a boy without friends, I rented a little office in the city of Atlanta, slept in it on a lounge, and offered my services to clients. They have friends in Congress who will see that they get justice; but they will lose their friends all over the land if they press on with this strike and produce the suffering which they will cause by the strike. For the first time in my life they would lack my sympathy.

Where are we to get the necessaries of life, such as food, right here in the city of Washington? How long can we get proper food supplies? Paralysis of every industry and almost of life will ensue if this strike is a success and goes on for two or three weeks. The men will then find that the farmer who suffers, who has been their friend; the man in the city shop who suffers, who has been their friend; the clerk in the store who suffers, who has been their friend; and the great body of the people who have been their friends, suffering from their course, will not continue their sympathy.

Mr. President, there is but one intelligent thing for them to do. They should postpone their proposed strike, set for next Monday, until after their Representatives in Congress have considered the subject and sought a way to keep from the balance of the people of the country the suffering about to be put upon them. If they do not suspend this strike, I do not believe two weeks will pass until they are made to stop it.

What I say I say with deep and earnest sympathy for these men, but with an appreciation of the rights of the balance of the people of the country and a consciousness of responsibility to them as well as to those who operate trains in interstate transportation. Ninety millions of people can not and must not be made to suffer because those who handle the trains and those who own the railroads do not agree upon hours of labor or pay for service. I am always pleased to see railroad men better their condition, but they should find a way without placing such dire distress upon their country and upon so many of their fellow citizens.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had not intended at this time to express any views concerning the crisis which confronts us, but since this discussion has become so general and has evolved some conclusions which I am unable to accept without qualification I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments.

There is nothing new, Mr. President, in the situation except its last development. Its details from their beginnings last spring down to the present time have been public. Our attention has been directed to them on a number of occasions. Ours is the optimism of the average individual, and this has doubtless caused us to hope and, therefore, to assume that some solution of the difficulty would be arrived at without the necessity of congressional action; so we have cheerfully gone our way in the belief that such might be the result. Now we find it essential, as the representatives of the people of the United States, to take some action in their behalf and to take it summarily, lest the Nation be involved in a widespread calamity.

Mr. President, last March, I think it was, the four great brotherhoods of the railway employees of the United States held a referendum with regard to certain demands which they contemplated presenting to the managers of the railways. Some of these demands were of great importance and some of minor concern. The referendum then taken authorized the heads of the brotherhoods to present these demands to the railway heads and to insist upon their recognition. It doubtless also clothed them with power to negotiate and, if possible, to reach a basis of agreement.

Acting upon this referendum vote and in pursuance of the instructions which that vote imposed upon them, they did confer with the representatives of the railroads, I think, for several weeks, without being able, however, to reach any conclusion, the representatives of the railroads being unwilling to make any concession whatever to their demands which did not involve the reopening of subjects which had before then been controverted and determined.

Now, I am not concerned at present, Mr. President, as to whether or not they were justified in assuming that attitude. I am merely stating facts as I understand them. It was because they could reach no common agreement that a second referendum was taken for the purpose of ascertaining the attitude of the men with regard to further action. These steps, I understand, were resorted to because required by the constitutions of the several brotherhoods.

That vote was taken, Mr. President, I think during the month of July; at any rate it extended over a considerable period of time, and culminated early this month in an overwhelming vote for a strike as an alternative to the refusal of the roads to grant their demands, or any of them.

Last May the situation was called to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who then suggested the enactment of legislation designed to meet a possible contingency, and warning the Senate not only of the contingent danger but of the necessity of some action by the Congress. His resolution was opposed by the Senator from Wisconsin. After a somewhat spirited debate no further action was taken; I do not think the subject was again discussed here until to-day.

Acting upon the authority with which they were invested by the so-called strike vote, another series of conferences was held between the brotherhood heads with the representatives of railways, and that also proved abortive. We are, of course, more intimately familiar with the events between the time when these negotiations were broken off and yesterday, when the President, failing as a mediator to bring the parties together or to secure any favorable result, was compelled, in the discharge of his duty, to lay the subject before Congress, acquaint them with his action, and urge its prompt consideration of the threatened cataclysm.

Mr. President, I think the views expressed by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a moment ago with regard to the effect of this strike upon public opinion are justified by the present situation. There is no question as to the extent to which the consequences of a paralysis of our great transportation systems will spread. No man can foresee them. If the trains constantly passing over the great lines of traffic of the United States and moving the enormous traffic of the people are suspended even for two or three weeks, not only will the privations and the sufferings and the miseries which the Senator referred to ensue, but the social disorder, the acts of violence and lawlessness, the destruction of human life and the destruction of property during the great industrial upheaval is appalling to contemplate; for, Mr. President, whenever the industrial forces of this country in any comprehensive way, territorially or numerically, or both, grapple in physical conflict over their differences, all of the criminal forces of society are unloosed; it is the opportunity of which they take swift advantage and they prey upon mankind wherever immunity exists or detection may seem unlikely.

If that be true—and we know it has been true in our experience with the industrial disturbances of the past—who can limit the extent to which crime and violence will spread in a great industrial strike like this, reaching from ocean to ocean and from our northern to our southern confines and affects an industry upon which all other industries are dependent, the uninterrupted operation of which is absolutely essential not only to our physical well being, but to our very existence as members of a great social community. It is this certain calamity, Mr. President, from which I shrink, because I believe unless this strike shall be arrested in some manner either by negotiation, by law, or by force we may become involved in civil war, with all its horrors multiplied, for it may be coexistent with the boundaries of the country and people of every community in the land with its tragedies.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that the brotherhoods do not want that; the railway managers do not want that; the President does not want it; no man or set of men can be found, with one possible exception, in all this country who do not shrink from the contemplation of such a horrible calamity.

But, Mr. President, I do not think it is fair to pivot all these consequences upon the brotherhoods. Theirs must be a part of the great responsibility if this strike shall be followed or attended by them. But we must not forget that there are two sides to the controversy, and if the worst ensues one side can not be held guiltless while the other receives the reprobation of public opinion. We may, speaking for the great body of the public, well say with Mercutio, "A plague o' both your houses." I do not think that the attitude of the men is any less reprehensible than that of those who are and have been opposing all of their demands and, as the President says, insisting upon the arbitration of a thing which seems to be impossible. And it is not amiss to remind the public that the railways have not always, nor very often, been the champions of arbitration. The industrial history of the past 30 years demonstrates the contrary. They have, until the organizations waxed powerful and insistent, challenged the proposal to arbitrate anything. Not until recently have they consented even to deal with their men collectively. Their new-found zeal for the principle is commendable, but their condemnation of all who do not accept it unqualifiedly is open to the criticism that it is now regarded as the sole alternative to concession.

Mr. President, when this suffering of the people comes, as it must, when little babies die for lack of the nutrition for which they are absolutely dependent upon our lines of transportation, when men and women go hungry by day and by night, when the fires of the incendiary blaze upon the horizon, and violence and disorder reign supreme, we shall remember that, if the men concerned in this unfortunate controversy are guilty, so also are those who, having the right and the power to carry on negotiations and make concessions, have declined to do so and are alike responsible.

I again say, Mr. President, with regard to the subject matter of the controversy and its equities, I am not now concerned. I speak as one representative of that great public, always the sufferer when crises like this culminate in strike and disorder, and to whom we owe the supreme duty of safeguarding as far as we can against the disorder which menaces it.

During the gradual expansion of this difficulty I received innumerable letters and telegrams requesting that I take no action whatever with regard to the controversy, but permit it to work out its own solution without legislative interference. Presumably my associates here were similarly petitioned. To all of them I replied that I thought such should be the attitude of Senators up to the time when the great public became interested, when their rights were imperiled, when their needs were involved, and that should such a condition confront us, it would be our common duty to take every step, if within the constitutional power of Congress, which the exigency demanded.

Mr. President, that crisis has come. I, for one, am prepared to meet it, and to meet it as fully as the occasion requires. I am prepared to act with expedition, and, if need be, to take the chances on every constitutional question which may confront us. For if this Government has not the power in a time like this to protect every unit which constitutes its citizenship, then it has no right to call itself a Government; and if in a time like this it forgets or disregards that duty by taking sides with either of the combatants in the struggle as against the needs and requirements of all, it will commit an error of which it will soon repent. Mr. President, at a time like this action is necessary, and inquiry with regard to the causes demanding it should be postponed to a more convenient season. When a man's house is on fire his supreme and primal duty is to extinguish the conflagration and ascertain the cause of it after that duty has been performed. We are confronted by a threatened industrial conflagration, which we must prevent, or, if we can not do that, we must extinguish it, or exhaust the resources of the Government in the effort to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The men who are representing the four brotherhoods are very intelligent men. I have had reason to confer with them myself. Does the Senator not feel that, if proper efforts should be made, not by legislative action at present, those men could be influenced to postpone this matter for a few days? They know the difficulty, undoubtedly, that confronts Congress in endeavoring to pass a bill in a given number of hours, or even in a given number of days; and it does seem to me, if the Senator himself, sympathizing with the men, as I do, and others should take this matter in hand, that the strike might at least be postponed for a reasonable time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, they are intelligent men; if they were not, they would not occupy the responsible positions which they now hold; but, in addition to being intelligent men, Mr. President, they are the representatives of many other intelligent men, for whom they are acting as in their representative capacity. What they are doing and have done I presume they are doing by the direction of their fellows. I hope that further appeal to them may result as the Senator suggests, and I am more than willing to make the appeal; but if he wants my opinion about it, I fear that it will have no effect. I think they have taken the step reluctantly after they had exhausted every effort to reach some conclusion with the railway heads, and they resorted to a strike as the last thing, the dire resort, but from their point of view the one remaining essential thing for the establishment of their demands in whole or in part. I may say to the Senator that the men they have been dealing with are also intelligent gentlemen, men of high standing and character; and does not the Senator think that if those well acquainted with these gentlemen would appeal to them they might be induced also to so modify their position upon the matters in dispute as to make possible the postponement of this strike?

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with my friend the Senator from Colorado that both sides ought to be appealed to, if an appeal can be made to them. During all my period of public service I have been strongly in favor of arbitration, and I greatly regretted that that principle in this case has evidently been thrown overboard; but manifestly it has been.

Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just a word further, I agree with the Senator as to the crisis that confronts us. I think it is likely to take a much wider sweep than merely the men that are represented by these four brotherhoods.

Mr. THOMAS Unquestionably. It will involve all trades and all occupations.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are more than 1,000,000 men engaged in railroad service who are not receiving as high compensation as these men who propose to strike. Those men, of course, will not remain quiescent; and, then, our experience in the past has taught a useful lesson as to what a sympathetic strike means.

The Senator can not, in my judgment, represent this matter too gravely to the American people. It is a very serious matter. It will involve not only the classes I have suggested, but, as the Senator has wisely suggested, it will include all the people of the United States in the disaster, if one comes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the situation which confronts us is, in some respects, quite as serious as that which confronted the Nation in 1861, not as affecting the integrity of the Union, not as imperiling the structure of our Government, but as threatening the peace, the safety, the lives, the welfare, and the property of all our people. Why, Mr. President, the railway system of the United States is as essential to our national life as is the system of arteries in the body to our physical life. Every industry, every calling, every pursuit is so interwoven and intermingled with this great labyrinth of transportation systems that every part of the country has become more or less dependent upon every other part. To suspend the operation of the system entirely, even for a short time, is like suspending the circulation of the blood in the human system; to suspend it indefinitely means social dissolution, unless the people, realizing their peril, shall in self-preservation, as I think they will, take the matter in their own hands, if need be, in the old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon way and put a stop to it, at whatever cost; but I do not want to see that. We do not want to see that, Mr. President. It is easy to arouse the wild beast in man. To suppress it when aroused is a bloody and an awful task.

Personally, I believe, so far as the demands of the men are for added pay, that they are not unreasonable. I may be mistaken about it. Consequently, I express that opinion with some hesitation. I have always contended that the railway engineer, considering his responsibilities, is the poorest-paid individual in our entire industrial system. If it be true that men are entitled to compensation in proportion to the extent of their responsibilities, then it is true that the man who runs a limited express train bearing the lives of hundreds of his fellow citizens, requiring his every faculty to be at all times alert, since the slightest mistake may result in disaster, receives a compensation which is infinitely small. The same thing is true in a more limited way of the other brotherhoods. But the locomotive engineer is sui generis. His trust is tremendous, his responsibility is unlimited. I believe, too, Mr. President, that a man employed in this capacity should not undergo the strain of his duties for a longer period than eight hours. I believe that the railroads owe it to society and to the safety of the traveling public that their men should be kept fit at all times, which is impossible, in view of the strain and stress of their occupations, if they are required to continue their labors for a longer continuous period than that which, as the President has rightfully said, seems to be established by the consensus of modern society as a day's work.

Mr. President, there may be good reasons why the eight-hour demand should not be conceded. I do not know, except that none of those which have been advanced so far appeals to me. The transportation business is not a private one. It is a great public utility, the greatest of them all. The fundamental mistake which I think was made by our fathers was the delegation of the business of transportation to private hands. Some of the consequences of that mistake we have suffered heretofore, some of them we are about to suffer now, and others we will encounter until we go back to the fundamental proposition and act upon it that transportation, being the life of the Nation, is a public function—an agency of the Government, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] suggests—one which never should have been delegated to others, and which must be recaptured as soon as it can be done consistently with the business of the country. Therein lies the chief, if not the only, solution of the formidable problem with which we are about to grapple.

Mr. President, we started out in the matter of railway building with State ownership. It was the Commonwealths of the Union which constructed the first railroads, with one or two exceptions. It is true that in a financial way their management was unscientific, and therefore bad. But the business was surrendered, and unfortunately surrendered, to private interests, since which time the keynote of railroad management, with here and there an exception, has been the operation of railroads for private aggrandizement, the public interests being a matter of secondary consideration. The operation of the roads and their manipulation have been for private emolument, irrespective of its effect either upon wages or upon the public. It is not necessary to establish that fact by more than referring to recent history, but it has been characteristic of railway management almost from its inception as a private business.

There are to-day great railroad systems in the hands of receivers. Why? Because they have been exploited and reexploited; because their stock has been watered; because they have been bonded beyond the limit of their actual value, all for the purpose of making fortunes for private individuals through the manipulation of the exchanges; and then, after these enormous liabilities have been created and the roads crushed under their intolerable burdens, the fact of their existence has been made the basis for the denial of demands for increase in wages.

Mr. President, the New York & New Haven Railway experiences of the past few years are fresh in the minds of all. We know how that stock was brought down from $200 to $65 in value and its effect upon the savings-bank surpluses all over New England. We also know that it increased in quantity as it decreased in value, until it became necessary for the Government to interfere and put an end to the saturnalia of frenzied and infamous finance by which a great and valuable property was wrecked to make a Wall Street holiday. This road has, in the last 24 hours, notified the unoffending public that it will not receive freight that can not be delivered by next Monday, because its employees demand a wage it can not pay. Of course it was represented in the recent conferences wherein all demands of the brotherhoods were rejected.

The Frisco receivership is also fresh in the minds of some. We remember how that road was looted by those who had control of it, and the consequent necessity of appointing receivers for it, and we may recall that nearly always when receivers are appointed for these plundered railways they are selected and recommended to the court by the gentlemen who have wrecked the road.

I hold in my hand a clipping from Collier's Weekly of December 27, 1913, bearing upon this road, which seems to me to be of some interest here.

Regarding the investigation of the Frisco receivership it was stated that—

"Chairman Clark and E. E. Brown, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, will lay before Congress the following:

"That the Frisco was compelled to carry and pay interest on a fictitious indebtedness of $40,000,000, created by enormous commissions paid to bankers and brokers for the sale of its securities and profits to promoters of feeder lines in the Southwest.

"That the chairman of its board of directors, B. F. Yoakum, made $7,000,000 profits for himself and associates trading with himself in the capacity of promoter and builder of Texas roads, which he caused to be sold to the Frisco at prices in excess of their value.

"That approximately $32,000,000 in the Frisco's total funded indebtedness of $244,000,000 was paid to bankers and brokers in commissions.

"That the average rate of commission was 12.05 per cent, while the profits of Mr. Yoakum and his associates in the promotion of the feeder lines sold to the Frisco ranged from 10 per cent to more than 100 per cent."

At almost the same time the Railway Age Gazette (issue of Nov. 7, 1913) was printing an article on "Locomotive fuel economy on the Frisco," showing how the care, cooperation, and loyalty of the rank and file of employees had lowered the 1912 fuel bill by $260,000 as compared with that for 1910.

That is to say, the employees of the road, urged by its officers, exercised economy in operation which resulted in a saving of $260,000 upon the fuel bill of 1912—a circumstance that is most commendable, but not at all unusual so far as the employees are concerned.

The plan was originated by W. C. Nixon, vice president in charge of operation, whose name does not apoear in the list of "insiders," and was a good, solid piece of work from beginning to end. The saving which hundreds of men thus wrought out will pay three-fifths of 1 per cent on the fictitious debt, or 3½ per cent on what the "insiders" took.

This saving, in other words, pays a very small annual interest upon the stealings of the officers during the same period of time, and of course the larceny was committed against the road of which they were trustees.

If the men worked thus for 28 years they would save for the road, without interest, the sum which the directors and officials have already taken by conspiracy from the road. This is what ails "big business." This is what breeds "class hatred." This is the sabotage of greed among those in authority, treason in place of leadership.

Mr. President, it is the existence of these practices which very largely forms the basis of the refusal to recognize the brotherhoods' demands. They can not do so and meet obligations which never should have been contracted, and which largely represent values which are largely or wholly fictitious. And yet the roads are prospering.

To say now, Mr. President, that the roads can not afford to make this increase, I think, is hardly justified by their own reports. The railroad earnings in December, 1915, were, gross, $282,170,816, or at the rate of more than $1,200,000,000 per annum; net, $101,837,933. In December, 1914, the net profit was $58,879,972. The increase for the corresponding month in 1915 over December, 1914, was $42,957,961. Surely the employees are entitled to a part of this good fortune.

I clipped this from a Washington paper:

UNION PACIFIC ROAD SHOWS LARGEST GAINS IN HISTORY.

NEW YORK, August 5.

A statement of the earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ended June 30 shows gross earnings of $104,717,005, the largest revenue in its history. This compares with gross earnings of $86,958,295 in the preceding year. The net earnings, after the payment of preferred dividends, were $34,795,768, which is equal to 15.65 per cent on the common stock, as compared with 10.98 in the previous year.

In other words, this great corporation for the fiscal year ending June 30, in addition to its fixed charges, earned over 15 per cent upon its watered stock, or more than $34,000,000. Of course this remarkable showing is not true of all roads, and the tender solicitude which the great roads have for the poor ones in this controversy is very touching. Unfortunately it is evanescent.

Mr. President, I refer to these matters merely to emphasize the fact that there are two sides to the question at issue between the roads and the men, and the American people—when they begin to suffer, as suffer they will, from their differences—will hold both of them responsible. I do not think they will make any distinction except as their judgment and their information requires it. I want to emphasize the fact that it is as much to the interest of the owners of the railroads of this country that this strike shall be averted as it is to the interest of the men who have called the strike to avert it. On the other hand, as I have said, it is to our interest to see, if possible, that it is averted, and if not, to stop it, by the exercise of the authority with which we are invested as the representatives of the people, by meeting the danger and applying promptly and without hesitation such remedies as the gravity of the crisis demands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO SENATOR TILLMAN.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, my colleague, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], has requested the Senate to grant him indefinite leave of absence on account of ill health, which request I now make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). If there is no objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the reading of the bill be continued.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there are very few Senators on that side present, and such a large representation on this side that possibly we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think myself the Republican side is entitled to more than two representatives while we are considering this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Chamberlain	Hughes	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Chilton	Husting	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Clarke, Ark.	James	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Jones	Penrose	Smith, S. C.
Curtis	Kenyon	Pomerene	Sterling
Dillingham	Lane	Ransdell	Thomas
du Pont	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Lewis	Sheppard	Williams
Hardwick	McCumber	Sherman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KERN, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. UNDERWOOD answered to their names when called.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TAGGART] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. REED, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

RELIEF SUPPLIES TO PEOPLE OF POLAND (S. DOC. NO. 540).

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent out of order to have printed as a public document and also in the RECORD a memorandum which I hold in my hand giving the present status of the negotiations of this country with the belligerent governments in Europe relative to negotiations for the shipment of relief supplies to the people in Russian Poland. It is a very important document, I think, giving the present situation in accordance with the resolution which was passed by the Senate some time ago, although not in response to that resolution. It is a memorandum which I have obtained for my information, and a number of Senators have desired that it should be published in this fashion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. As a public document?

Mr. SAULSBURY. As a public document and in the RECORD also.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; not both. I have no objection to having it printed in the RECORD, but I object to having it printed in the RECORD and as a public document.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I ask leave to have it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SURVEYS OF DISTILLERIES.

Mr. HUGHES. The bill (H. R. 9542) to amend the second paragraph of section 3264 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 5 of the act of March 1, 1879, and as further amended by the act of Congress approved June 22, 1910, has been adopted as an amendment to the revenue bill. I move that this bill be taken from the calendar and indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a communication signed by the president and cashier of the Robertson Banking Co., of Demopolis, Ala., relative to the clearance of checks by the Federal reserve banks and members and incidentally by State banks as they will be forced to clear at par if the member banks of the Federal Reserve System clear at par.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOPOLIS, ALA., August 21, 1916.

To the Member of Congress addressed:

Subject: Par clearance of checks by the Federal reserve banks and members, and incidentally by State banks as they will be forced to clear at par if the member banks of the Federal Reserve System clear at par.

We do not believe that our Congressmen and Senators who have not made a study of the banking business fully appreciate the significance of this proposition, and we wish to say a few words with reference to this remarkable measure which forces a bank to render a service and decrees that the bank shall not make any charge for this service.

In order that you may clearly understand the nature of this service, we will endeavor to give you an illustration, to wit: John Doe who lives in Demopolis, Ala., orders a buggy from Sears, Roebuck & Co., of Chicago, Ill., and John Doe sends his personal check for $59, drawn on a local bank in Demopolis, Ala., to Sears, Roebuck & Co. to pay for the buggy. John Doe knows that he could have gone to the bank and gotten New York exchange for $59 or a money order at the post office, and he knows that Sears, Roebuck & Co would greatly prefer New York exchange or a money order to his personal check on a local bank, but John Doe knows that if he buys New York exchange or a money order that it will cost him 15 or 20 cents to get this money to Sears, Roebuck & Co., and he decides that he will send his personal check on his local bank, and let Sears, Roebuck & Co. pay the little charge that the local bank makes in remitting same. John Doe figures that Sears, Roebuck & Co. are making a good profit on the buggy and that they can very well afford to pay the small cost for the transfer of funds from Demopolis, Ala., to Chicago. Now, the Federal reserve steps in and says to Sears, Roebuck & Co.: "If you will route this check for $59 that you have just received from John Doe through our system, we will see that the bank on which it is drawn makes no charge whatever for remitting same. We, the Federal Reserve System, are forcing the country banks to remit these checks without charge, and if we can not accomplish what we desire in any other way, we will collect these checks for you through the post office. It is true that the country banks have to employ efficient clerks at good salaries in order to maintain an efficient collection and transit department and have to furnish their own postage, and it is also true that there is considerable responsibility involved, but all of this does not cut any ice with us, and we, the Federal Reserve System will force the country banks to render this service of sending this money from Demopolis, Ala., to Sears, Roebuck & Co. at Chicago without any charge and make them pay the freight in the way of postage."

Now, suppose John Doe instead of sending his personal check on the local bank should go to the post office and buy a money order, paying the usual fee for the same, or should send the money by registered mail, paying the usual fee of 10 cents, besides the postage, and then should ask the postmaster why Uncle Sam should charge him a fee for this service, don't you suppose the postmaster would reply that it costs Uncle Sam something to maintain a Post Office Department and that the service rendered was worth the small fee that was charged?

Now, that is just the way the country banks feel about this thing, and we wish to assure you that feeling is running very high, and in some localities has a distinct political significance.

The Federal Reserve System has so far rendered only one service to its country members in that it is claimed for the system that it eliminates the possibility of financial panics. This may be true or not; but granting that it is true, and with that exception, we can not see that it has done anything for the country banks except to limit very materially their earning power. In the first place, the country bank is required to invest a part of its own capital in the capital of the reserve bank, on which it can never expect to receive over 6 per cent. (Country banks can not exist on 6 per cent interest.) In the next place, it is required to keep on deposit a considerable sum of money in the Federal reserve banks, on which it does not receive the customary 2 per cent on daily balances that is allowed by all the large banks to their country corresponding banks; and on top of this now comes the par clearance plan, which forces them to remit Sears, Roebuck & Co. et al. and not charge anything for the service, paying the postage, and being responsible for the safe delivery of the money, etc. Representative CARTER GLASS's statement that four-fifths of the State banks derive one-half of their revenue from what he calls "check collection charges" is, in our opinion, absolutely untrue, and we believe that the total revenue derived by the banks from this service will not exceed 15 per cent of the total net income of the banks. We think that 90 per cent of the country national banks and the country State banks can continue to exist in spite of the par clearance plan, but we submit to you that it is not fair nor just nor right to force this thing on us. We feel that when we render a service that we are entitled to a reasonable compensation for that service. We do not feel that the Federal Government has any more right to require banks to render a service without charge than it has to say to the railroads that they must let all of the natural-born citizens of this country travel and pay no fare. It is true that some small banks may make exorbitant charges for their services, which custom we deplore, and we realize that you sometimes find unscrupulous men engaged in the banking business, just as you find them in other lines of business, but that does not justify the condemnation of the entire fraternity, and we feel that the wise course for our Federal Government to pursue in the matter of collection charges on checks would be the regulation of these charges and not the elimination of same. The proposition as it stands now is one that is entirely in favor of the large banks and money centers and the big department stores and catalogue houses in our large cities. In other words, it is largely in favor of the people who are always encouraging our people to trade away from home.

The governors and directors of our Federal reserve banks are nearly all men who can not see this thing from the standpoint of the country banks. They are men who have been identified all their lives with "big business" in large cities: and while they are most excellent and capable men, their visions are clouded, so that it is impossible for them to see this thing except through the eyes of big business, big cities, and big banks.

The numerous country banks are the bone and sinew of the banking system, and we feel that it is of vital interest to all that these banks have a profitable existence. The bank that is making money is a safe bank; but if by legislation you cripple its earning power to any considerable extent, you are liable to cause it to "peter out" of existence, and the harm you would do in this way would be infinitely greater than any good that you might do to Sears, Roebuck & Co. et al. in distant cities and money centers.

In conclusion we wish to quote in part a very timely editorial which appears in the August number of the Southern Banker:

"In the multitude of counsel there is wisdom, and it is to be hoped that the next few weeks will bring about changes that may reconcile the situation and obviate the features of the plan to the extent that such important enterprises as the smaller banks may continue a prosperous and profitable existence. The welfare of these institutions is now vitally affected. They have built the country, and they are entitled to a profitable existence. Any measure that deprives them of a profitable existence strikes at the development of our country, and this is particularly true of the South."

We sincerely hope that you will give the Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN your vigorous support in his effort to secure the amendment to section 16 that will be shortly introduced.

Respectfully,

W. S. PROUT,
President Robertson Banking Co., Demopolis, Ala.
J. D. YONWEED,
Cashier Commercial National Bank, Demopolis, Ala.

ACCEPTANCE OF PORTRAITS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Out of order, I desire to submit a favorable report from the Committee on the Library. From that committee I report back favorably with an amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government of portraits of Hon. James Latimer and Hon. Dr. Henry Latimer, and I submit a report (No. 835) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was to add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That no expense incurred shall be paid by or chargeable to the Government of the United States.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Vice President of the United States be authorized to accept, in behalf of the Government, portraits of Hon. James Latimer, who presided over the first convention to ratify the Constitution of the United States, and Hon. Dr. Henry Latimer, who was a surgeon general in the Continental Army and a Senator of the United States from Delaware: Provided, That no expense incurred shall be paid by or chargeable to the Government of the United States.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, only a word in regard to the joint resolution. A very highly esteemed lady in the community in which I live has offered to present to the Government the pictures of two of her ancestors. They are to be in accordance with the specifications and subject to the approval of the Art Commission. One is the portrait of a former Senator of the United States and a surgeon general in Gen. Washington's army during the Revolutionary War. The other is a portrait of his father, who was a very eminent Delawarean and who presided over the Constitutional Convention which ratified the Constitution of the United States, and was the first man to sign any document ratifying that great charter.

The amendment of the committee is entirely in accord with the understanding with which these portraits were presented, and I hope there will be no objection to the joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask to go back to page 6 for the purpose of moving to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment appearing on that page, lines 12 to 17, inclusive, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The object of the Senator from Arkansas is to offer an amendment to the Senate committee amendment at that place. I think the amendment he proposes to offer makes the provision as it now stands a good deal better. Furthermore, the language of the amendment as it stands is obnoxious to the decision of the court. I therefore join with him in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I offer a substitute for the portion proposed to be inserted by the committee, which I ask may be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after line 11, in lieu of amendment proposed by the committee, insert:

(c) For the purpose of ascertaining the gain derived from a sale or other disposition of real property, the profits realized within the year from the sale or other disposition of any real estate purchased within two years previous to the close of the year for which such income is estimated, shall be the basis for determining the amount of such gain so derived from such sale or other disposition thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With that amendment adopted, there ought to be inserted the same amendment where the measure of losses sustained is to be considered, because it involves the same question. I therefore ask unanimous consent that if adopted the same amendment shall be handed to the clerks at the desk by the Senator from Arkansas to be inserted at the other place in the bill where it would be relevant.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know the purpose of the amendment, and why it is offered now after the committee amendment has been adopted?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am very glad to explain it. The purpose of the amendment for which this has been substituted was to fix a date when the profits of an investment should cease to be income and become capital. The amendment adopted heretofore fixed March 1, 1913, as that date and made it a permanent date, so that no matter how long this act might remain in force that would be the date from which the investment as capital would be considered and all profits intervening would be income.

This has been one of the troublesome questions in tax legislation. In 1867 Congress fixed the period within which real estate investments should be treated as income at two years. The matter was brought to the Supreme Court in the case of Gray against Darlington, in Fifteenth Wallace, where it was held that profits during the current year were properly treated as income, that if the investment inured for a longer period it became merged in capital and it was not proper to fix it as income.

That feature was carried into the subsequent income-tax law down to the one passed in 1894. The last income tax left it out entirely, so that the only part of the profit on real estate investment, or any other investment for that matter, which should become profit for the purpose of being treated as income would accrue within the current year.

The purpose of this act is to adopt as an approved rule two years as against real estate investments; that is to say investments made in real estate and not consummated by a subsequent sale for a period greater than two years shall be treated as no part of the income, but are to be taken as a part of the loss and profit of that character of transaction and be permitted to pass as increased capital. If a sale occurred any time within the two years the profit on the transaction would be treated as income and accounted for accordingly.

It fixes a date that travels along with the law instead of fixing absolutely a day, which was the 1st of March, 1913. That would have involved the necessity of making an assessment every time an income-tax return was made with a view of determining whether or not in the meantime some profit had not attached to it. The one is a sensible, forcible rule, and the other is an exceedingly inconvenient one which does not in all cases do justice, because it might turn out that some investments would produce no profit whatever. No provision is made for taking care of that contingency.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. According to what I heard of the amendment read, it differs from the amendment which the Senate adopted also in this respect, that the amendment adopted by the Senate includes not only real estate but also personal and mixed property. I should like to know what becomes of the profit on personal or mixed property.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On personal property any profit made during the current year would be accounted for as income. Profit not made on that character of property during the year, or rather realized by the sale, would not be treated as income. That is the universal rule.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there any provision for that in the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The first section of the bill provides:

(a) That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid annually upon the entire net income received in the preceding calendar year from all sources by every individual, a citizen or resident of the United States, a tax of 2 per cent upon such income.

That language was deemed sufficient in the case of Gray against Darlington and fixed the period of the annual accounting. If the Senator will permit me, I will read the syllabus in that case, which will make much clearer than I have been able to do the point I am seeking to present to the Senate. It is the case of Gray against Darlington, reported in Fifteenth Wallace, page 63:

The advance in the value of personal property during a series of years does not constitute the gains, profits, or income of any one particular year of the series, although the entire amount of the advance be at one time turned into money by a sale of the property. Accordingly, when bonds of the United States were sold by the owner, after being held by him four years, at an advance of $20,000 over their cost to him, it was held that this amount was not taxable as "gains, profits, or income" of the owner for the year in which the sale was made, under the amendatory internal-revenue act of March 2, 1867.

The Supreme Court said in disposing of that matter——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Without the necessity of calling attention to it, I will yield to the Senator until this colloquy closes. On page 66 the court said:

The mere fact that property has advanced in value between the date of its acquisition and sale does not authorize the imposition of the tax on the amount of the advance. Mere advance in value in no sense constitutes the gains, profits, or income specified by the statute. It constitutes and can be treated merely as increase of capital.

That is my answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I still am not able to understand it. I will put a case to the Senator. Suppose a man has purchased in a certain year stocks or bonds and two years thereafter there is an advance of $20,000. Is the man just taxed for one year only on the profit made?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He is not taxed at all on that, because it ceases to be income and becomes capital.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What reason is there for taxing the man upon the profit he makes upon the sale of real estate within two years and not taxing him upon the profit he makes on the purchase and sale of securities?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That always has been carried as a discrimination in the law. Whatever my opinion is, it ought to be confined to the annual accounting. There is no necessity really for making a distinction against real estate, but it always has been made, and I thought it would be a preferable rule to the one the committee adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Real estate is not a live asset, and is not generally bought and sold within one year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think that answers the question at all. Why should we exempt from income tax the profit the man makes upon the purchase and sale of stocks and bonds? Why should they not be included with real estate, just as they were originally included in this paragraph?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They are included now, if the purchase and sale is made within a year. That is the law. The Supreme Court of the United States answered that question, and held that it is a part of his capital, and a tax can not be levied upon it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am at a loss to see why the increase in the value of real estate is not a part of the capital.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That matter may be decided some day and determined to the contrary, but at present the decision of the Supreme Court seems to treat it as a valid provision. There are numerous grounds upon which a distinction between real and personal property can be established, where one rule of taxation applies in one case and another in another. Bonds pass very frequently and very rapidly many times, whereas, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, that is not the rule in the case of real property.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me we are proposing to exempt from taxation some of the most enormous profits made in this country. For instance, during the last year or two perfectly prodigious incomes have been derived by men through successful speculation in the purchase and sale of stocks and bonds, and the incomes derived from the purchase and sale of real estate are insignificant by comparison. I do not like to assent to exempting those profits while continuing to tax the profits on real estate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator misunderstands me if he thinks I am trying to exempt their profits from taxation. I simply want to establish a rule that applies in every other character of taxation provided for in this bill, and that is the annual accounting. That is what was done in this particular case. The tax collector in New York collected an income tax of $20,000 upon an increase on bonds that the taxpayer had been holding for four years. He paid the tax under a protest and sued the collector for it, and that is the way this particular lawsuit was decided, and like every other lawsuit will be decided.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am frank to say I really do not understand the effect of this amendment. There was a good deal of discussion over this particular amendment, I will say to the Senator, and it involves two other amendments which I supposed and those who think with me on the subject supposed had been settled. This seems to change the whole proposition, and before it is acted upon I should like to have the matter go over until to-morrow, it involving three amendments, as I suggested.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have no objection to that course. The matter was submitted to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who proposed the amendment which is now offered as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to postponing the consideration of this question until to-morrow?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection, although I wish it could be disposed of now. The Senator from Alabama who drew the amendment which is upon the bill now has agreed to this amendment to the amendment. I think the amendment to the amendment helps the amendment itself very much. But I have no objection to its going over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope we will now proceed with the consideration of the revenue bill, but before the Secretary renews the reading of the bill, I desire to state that this section of the bill as to special taxes, also the section relative to documentary stamp taxes, and the section creating a tariff commission, were referred to a subcommittee of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is the acting chairman; and I shall therefore ask him to look after amendments to those provisions of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 99, after line 19, to insert:

First. Corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations shall pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital, surplus, and undivided profits used in any of the activities or functions of their business, including such sums as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, or other securities. The amount of such annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits for the preceding fiscal year. Every corporation, joint-stock company, or association as defined and limited in section 10, Title I, of this act, shall be liable to this tax: Provided, That for the purpose of this tax an exemption of $99,000 shall be allowed from the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of each corporation: And provided further, That corporations actually paying the tax imposed by section 41 of Title III of this act shall be entitled to a credit as against the tax imposed by this paragraph equal to the amount of the tax so actually paid: And provided further, That this tax shall not be imposed upon any corporation not engaged in business or which had no net income, as defined in Title I of this act, during the preceding taxable year, or which are exempt under the provisions of section 11, Title I, of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the committee amendment, on page 100, line 2, after the word "year," I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting:

But excluding in the case of insurance companies such deposits and reserve funds as they are required by law or contract to maintain or hold for the protection of or payment to or apportionment among policyholders.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this portion of the bill a question. I do not know that I clearly understood the amendment; but I presume it was intended partially to effect the same purpose as the amendment which was offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] yesterday.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not hear the speech of the Senator of New York or see his amendment. At that very time, by request of the committee, I was preparing an amendment to free from tax a certain class of trust assets held by fire and life insurance companies that we did not think ought properly to be subject to this tax. I have shown the amendment to the Senator from New York, and we agree about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not hear what the amendment was or where it was proposed to be inserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will be stated from the desk.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 100, line 2, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert:

But excluding in the case of insurance companies such deposits and reserve funds as they are required by law or contract to maintain or hold for the protection of or payment to or apportionment among policyholders.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that raises the question that ought to be raised in this committee amendment, as to whether or not any tax whatever should be levied upon insurance companies. I purpose to offer an amendment on page 99, line 20, after the word "companies," to insert the words "except insurance companies." I think that that amendment at least should be voted upon before the amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Georgia. If it should be voted in the affirmative, of course there would be no occasion for the other amendment; but if it be voted down, as I assume that probably it will be, then the qualification of the committee amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia would be most proper.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment to the amendment, so as to give the Senator from North Dakota an opportunity of presenting his amendment, although I desire to say that I do not think his amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted. We have carefully sought by this amendment to avoid taxing the trust funds of the insurance companies that do not stand upon the same status as the capital of other companies.

I will also say to the Senator that this amendment has been prepared with a great deal of care, using the technical terms as to reserves, and that it applies to both fire and life insurance companies. I think it goes as far as fairness and justice require us to go, and that it is liberal to the insurance companies.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, on page 99, line 20, after the word "companies," I move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "except insurance companies."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota understands that not only insurance companies, but all the other corporations enumerated in the committee amendment, are entitled to the same exemptions that apply to corporations, including insurance companies, under the income-tax section of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is to say, it does not apply to mutual insurance companies or to fraternal orders or to the various other characters and kinds of insurance that are exempted from the payment of the income tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that, and I also understand that it would be necessary to make other amendments in order to free the insurance companies from any taxes whatever.

Mr. President, I want to say just a word on the amendment to the amendment. Section 10 of the bill provides for a tax of 2 per cent on net incomes of corporations, stock companies, and insurance companies. That is one tax. Section 56 provides for a tax of 50 cents per $1,000 of capital, surplus, and undivided profits, including such sums as may be invested in or loaned upon mortgages. That is a second tax. Then section 69 provides for a stamp tax of one-half of 1 per cent on each premium charged of $1 or fractional part thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I desire to say that I am instructed when we reach the stamp tax on insurance companies to withdraw it. That provision will not be pressed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. In addition, then, to these two taxes the stockholders are taxed, of course, upon their individual incomes. That would give three or four taxes practically upon the same business or upon the same fund.

The whole question, it seems to me, Mr. President, is a question of public policy. Ought we to encourage that frugality which looks to the care of old age? We recognize the fact that every dollar of tax will ultimately be charged in some form or another to the policyholders. The old-age pension laws of some of the countries of the world are already very onerous. We have no such laws in the United States; I hope we shall never be under the necessity of such enactment; but we all agree that there ought to be a time in the life at least of the ordinary workingman when he can drop the working tools of life and live either upon that which he has accumulated or which he has laid aside in some trust company's hands or in the hands of some insurance company.

We ought to make insurance just as cheap as possible. We know from the past history of insurance companies that, on account of carelessness in operation and excessive salaries paid to presidents and other officials, life insurance and, in many instances, insurance against casualties has been altogether too high. The tendency of late years has been to remedy those excesses and to make insurance cheaper. We ought to encourage every American to provide against sickness and to protect his family in case of his death, and the only way that we can encourage him properly is to make insurance as profitable to him as we can, and that means that he shall be able to secure it at as little expense as possible. We eliminate that much expense if we relieve the policyholder from the taxes which in the end will always be loaded onto him.

The same rule holds good with reference to fire insurance, hail insurance, cyclone insurance, and insurance against all of the elements or against casualties generally. I should hope, Mr. President, that we could carry the financial burden of this Government without imposing a portion of it upon the policyholders and those who seek insurance.

I have a letter here from the Insurance Federation of North Dakota, which I think presents the whole argument in a nutshell, and I will ask that the Secretary read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INSURANCE FEDERATION OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Fargo, N. Dak., August 22, 1916.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Confirming telegram of even date, reading:

"Insurance Federation of North Dakota, representing all branches of insurance world and organized throughout State, protests against amended revenue bill increasing income taxation of insurance companies and continuing stamp tax on policies while relieving other lines. Insurance business so intimately affects welfare of all people that imposition of added burden merely unjustly increases insurance cost and unfairly adds to burden on public. Letter follows. Advise us of your stand.

"INSURANCE FEDERATION OF NORTH DAKOTA,
"By HARRY CURRAN WILBUR, Executive Secretary."

The officers and directors of this federation, which represents every branch of the insurance business, whether organized on the stock, mutual, or fraternal basis, and which includes in its membership the buyers of insurance as well as the sellers, asks your active efforts to prevent the enactment of this or other legislation the result of which is to increase unjustly insurance taxes and the cost of insurance to the general public.

Insurance is second only to transportation in importance to the general public. In the last analysis it is the real basis of credit and the balance wheel of business. What affects it in any of its branches vitally affects all business interests, large and small, and the welfare of individuals in the city and on the farm.

Federal, State, and local taxes are very heavy now. All efforts to decrease the cost of insurance to the purchaser are thwarted by such special taxation, which unjustly singles out this business and saddles it with an unnecessary expense, thereby increasing the cost of operation and, in turn, the cost to the insurance purchaser of protection he must have against hail, fire, tornado, and the ravages of illness and death.

If the amended bill passes, thousands of insurance buyers in this State and millions in the country at large will be the ultimate sufferers. Can we count upon you to help protect their interests?

The Insurance Federation of North Dakota, uniting all branches of the business and organized throughout the State, is carrying on a campaign of education on insurance matters, and meetings are being held in the county seats to get the real facts before the people at large. Our object is service to the public as a whole and to provide sound insurance at a minimum cost.

Will you please advise us promptly of your stand on this measure and direct your secretary to send us copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the story of this amendment's progress, in order that we may have a complete record for our bulletin service here?

Again asking that you use your active efforts to prevent the enactment of this and other unjust insurance legislation,

Yours, very truly,

INSURANCE FEDERATION OF NORTH DAKOTA,
By HARRY CURRAN WILBUR, Executive Secretary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if any man who had labored until he was 60 years of age for a mere living and to support his family, without laying up anything, should have a life-insurance policy of $10,000 for the support of his widow and family, I would think it most unjust, I would think it bad governmental policy, to levy a tax upon that meager amount of savings for the family; and yet I can see no difference between that and levying a tax upon the amount that will be paid in premiums for insurance. I do not think that anyone could by taking half a day in argument present the matter more clearly than it has been presented in the letter which has been read at the desk. It is simply a question of public policy which every Senator thoroughly understands, namely, whether it is advisable to free insurance companies, and thereby to that extent free policyholders, of any burden of taxation upon their savings, against the misfortunes of business, against death, or against the destruction of the property which they have acquired through long years of labor. It seems to me that they should be free from any burden of taxation, and that is why I have offered the amendment. If it shall be carried, of course it will be necessary to make further amendments in other portions of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have done for the insurance companies in this bill all that their friends could possibly ask. We have taken care of the policyholders. We intend to omit the stamp tax upon policies, which has been incorporated in the present bill as reported. When that provision is reached, I have been authorized to say, we will not ask for its enactment. On the contrary, we desire that it be stricken from the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at that point let me ask the Senator one question. Does not the Senator believe that whatever is paid out by the insurance companies in the way of taxes will be made up in the added cost of insurance to the policyholders?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If so, their conduct will be utterly inexcusable. Now, let me read to you what we have exempted from taxation under this section.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator, after he has done that, state exactly what is left in the bill, so far as taxing insurance companies is concerned?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator before he reads the amendment to which he has referred if he has been authorized to offer the amendment at the proper time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have already offered it, and I only failed to press it in order that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] might first present his amendment exempting everything connected with insurance companies. This is the amendment that we offer:

But excluding, in the case of insurance companies, such deposits and reserve funds as they are required by law or contract to maintain or hold for the protection of or payment to or apportionment among policyholders.

It simply leaves as the subject of taxation that part of the capital that belongs in no sense to the policyholders; that is, not the reserve or the trust fund or the policyholders' fund. We will really get very little from them, in my opinion; but it was only fair that the part of the funds which were personal to the stockholders or the corporation, and not a trust fund, should be treated like the funds of other corporations.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right here?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me finish, please, first.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have sought from those well versed in insurance the terms that would exempt all of the funds that belong or go to their policyholders, and I want to say that the representatives of the companies feel that we have done for them all that we properly could do in this matter; at least, I judge so from their expressions of appreciation, that we have recognized these trust funds and deposit funds that belong to the policyholders as funds that should not be subject to this tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not think so, Mr. President, from the telegrams that are coming to me daily; but laying that aside, how much does the Senator expect to collect from these insurance companies after the amendment which he proposes has been adopted?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know; it is difficult to say; but the other funds that they have, beyond those we have exempted, we could not properly exempt unless we discriminated in their favor against all other corporations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate that; but suppose that you collect $10,000,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no idea we will collect any thing like that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, suppose we say $5,000,000. I do not care how many millions we assume.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose we say half a million dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. But whatever the amount may be that will be collected next year, does the Senator for a moment believe that that will not be carried, not as a charge against those who have already made their contract of insurance, but into the matter of fixing rates of insurance for the future, to cover that loss?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not for one moment. The company that increased the rates on account of this tax would find other companies declining to do so and pointing out the unfairness of their conduct, and would lose business by it. The amount placed upon it is really very small. They realize that themselves. We have guarded their trust funds so carefully that no one of them has any excuse for complaint, and so far as I know no one of them does complain; and I have not the slightest idea that it will be carried on to the policyholders.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, just one word. We will all agree that the only source of income that the insurance companies have is the money paid by policyholders, and also income upon their investments from the money paid by policyholders, which is again invested in other properties. As those are their only two sources of income, it necessarily follows that any expense connected with conducting their business—any overhead charges, or any taxes, or anything else that adds to the expense of the business—will, of course, be charged ultimately to those who will take out policies. It must be; otherwise these companies would be doing business for pleasure, and not for profit.

It is to save to these policyholders of the future such sums as would be placed upon them through this system of taxation that I offer my amendment. It is upon the general policy that we ought to encourage that frugality, as I have said, which looks to the protection of age. I think that is all there is in the question; and if we desire to tax these people, the policyholders of the future, making their policies cost them at least a little more, we can do it in this manner.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not a cent more.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word.

A great many of the representatives of the large insurance companies have been here in connection with this bill. They came here with reference to certain things about which they protested. This particular tax was not one of those things. It was mentioned in some of their telegrams when they were enumerating the various taxes that they would have to pay under the bill as it was originally amended by the Senate committee.

I have had many talks with these representatives of the insurance companies, and I will say to the Senator that I do not recall now that a single one of them protested against this particular tax of 50 cents on the $1,000 of capital. On the contrary, quite a number of them said that they had no complaint to make of that which did not apply to all other corporations as well as to them. They had no complaint to make of that.

The complaint was as to other things, and we have yielded to their complaints as to all the other matters except one, and that is embraced in the amendment of the Senator from New York. With that single exception, I understand that these gentlemen went home satisfied.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not making any argument for the benefit of the stockholders of the insurance company or of the officers. They will probably make just as much whether you levy this tax or not. The argument I have made has been based upon my view of a great public policy that we ought to adopt for the benefit of the public and the policyholder, of those who desire to insure to protect themselves in their old age.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 100, after the word "year," on line 2, it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the words:

but excluding, in the case of insurance companies, such deposits and reserve funds as they are required by law or contract to maintain or hold for the protection of or payment to or apportionment among policyholders.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I also desire to offer an amendment on line 23, page 99, after the word "sums," so that it may be clearer as to its meaning. The line will then read:

including such sums of capital, surplus, and undivided profits as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "sums," in the committee amendment, on page 99, line 23, it is proposed to insert "of capital, surplus, and undivided profits."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question: What is the significance and purpose of the exemption of $99,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The tax is a small one, and to follow up all the small companies would cost just about as much as it would amount to. It is only 50 cents a thousand, and the expense of hunting up $5 in each case, it was felt—and especially some of them which would not be $5, but only $2.50—was really more annoyance than it would be worth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a tax of 50 cents on every $1,000 of capital stock, in the case of a $100,000 corporation, if my arithmetic is correct, is $50, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, that was the reason expressed at the time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the exemption were lowered so as to apply the tax to $50,000 corporations, you could still collect $25 out of them. It does work an injustice to this extent——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The same amount is to be deducted in the case of all other corporations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This applies, as I understand, to all kinds of corporations that have a capital stock of over $99,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (reading)—

That for the purpose of this tax an exemption of $99,000 shall be allowed from the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of each corporation.

It applies to every corporation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; every corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The larger ones and the smaller ones, and it was suggested that the department should not be required to hunt up the smaller corporations, and that it was better to leave the figure as it is here. I think we started at $50,000. That was our original idea, and it was changed to $99,000. But the same amount is deducted in the case of every corporation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I understand that, Mr. President. For myself, I believe that if we are to collect taxes by direct methods we should propose a light tax on a large number of payers instead of a heavy tax on a small number of payers; and I think had I been a member of the Finance Committee, or perhaps of the Democratic conference, I would have urged a $50,000 exemption instead of the $99,000 exemption and would have reduced the rate.

It does work an injustice in some respects. Some of the States by law compel certain classes of corporations to have a capital stock in excess of $100,000. They have no choice in the matter. They must have a capital stock in excess of $100,000. I have in mind the fire insurance corporations of New York, which must have a capital stock of $200,000. But there are many other States whose laws make no provision as to what financial strength their fire insurance companies shall have. In some States that I can think of you could organize insurance company after insurance company of $98,000 capital, as many as you want, and they would never pay any tax under this provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would certainly be a very weak insurance company. I do not think it would do much business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are a great many fire insurance companies of one kind or another of less than $99,000 capital. That one instance happens to come to my mind. There are other kinds of corporations besides insurance corporations whose capital stock is less than $99,000 and who could well afford to pay a little something toward the support of the Government if a corporation of $100,000 could pay it. If you had taken a capitalization of $50,000 and assessed 50 cents on every thousand dollars of capital stock, you still would have had $25 paid in the way of taxation.

I think the provision is open to the same criticism that I tried to point out the other day—that it is part of the attempt to collect the revenues of the Government by a comparatively heavy tax upon a small number of taxpayers instead of by a comparatively light tax upon a large number of taxpayers. I do not care to offer any amendment, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know what the Senate will do about it. If it should pass in this shape and the conferees should bring it back, taxing them at $50,000, I should vote for the report of the conferees.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I see there is no provision here for the taxation of the major portion of the thousand dollars. The tax is levied at the rate of 50 cents for every thousand dollars of the capital. Was it the intention of the committee—perhaps it was not the intention—to say, "50 cents on every thousand dollars or major portion thereof"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is an express statement that each corporation shall have an exemption of $99,000 from the sum upon which the 50 cents is levied.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, if its entire capital stock were $99,000——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would pay a tax only on $900.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not 50 cents on the thousand. That is what I am asking the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know whether it says "or any part thereof" or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; it does not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, they would not pay any tax at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They would not pay any tax, even if they had $99,900 capital?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would be necessary for them to have $1,000 capital above the $99,000 to pay any tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall not insist upon the major fraction being taxed. I think these taxes are too high now.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand this amendment, it requires the payment of this 50 cents for each thousand dollars of capital, no matter what the value of the stock may be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is not on the stock at all; it is on the capital. It does not say "capital stock."

Mr. JONES. No; I see. Is there a provision here that puts a tax of 50 cents per thousand on the stock of a corporation regardless of the value of the stock?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the intention.

Mr. JONES. What section is that?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the intention of this section.

Mr. JONES. That is what I thought.

Mr. SIMMONS. What was the statement of the Senator?

Mr. JONES. I understand this to be a tax of 50 cents per $1,000 upon the capital stock of every corporation, regardless of the value of that stock, provided it exceeds the $99,000 exemption.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. JONES. Is there any provision in the bill anywhere, then, which imposes a tax of 50 cents a thousand upon the capital stock of a corporation?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. This is the only provision that imposes a tax of this character upon any corporation. This is upon the capital, the surplus, and the undivided profits used in the activities or functions of the business of the corporation, including such sums—the committee now proposes to add this after the word "sums"—"including such sums of capital, surplus, and undivided profits as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds," and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I feel it incumbent upon me to express a dissent from the statement of the chairman of the committee. My understanding of this provision is that it is a tax upon the capital stock, whatever the par value of the capital stock may be. If it does not do that it is different from what I supposed it meant and what I think it ought to mean. If you are going to levy a tax of this kind upon the capital, it is a very serious question whether it would not include money raised on notes and mortgages and invested in the business, because that is capital, and certainly that was not the intention.

There was some question about this matter which caused me to look into the authorities somewhat. I have not made a very extensive investigation, but so far as I have gone I find that "capital" and "capital stock," when used as a basis for a tax of this kind, are the equivalents of each other. This is an excise tax. It does not, strictly speaking, apply to the capital stock, because the capital stock belongs not to the corporation, but to the stockholders; but it is made the basis of an excise tax upon the corporation. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. JONES. I had that impression. I have here a letter addressed to my colleague which came after he left with reference to this particular matter.

Mr. THOMAS. I should perhaps add, if the Senator will permit me, that I had a conference of considerable length with the chairman of the board of directors of one of the big railroad systems of the country, and he is quite content with the tax, if it is limited upon the capital stock; but if it is to be construed otherwise and is limited not upon the capital stock but applied to the capital in business and the bonded indebtedness of the road, then he thinks it would be unfair, and I agree with him. So the notion of levying a tax upon the capital of a company, unless it means the capital stock, might produce a very much larger revenue on the one hand and inflict considerable injustice upon the other.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps the Senator has not observed the language after line 12:

That this tax shall not be imposed upon any corporation not engaged in business or which had no net income, as defined in Title I of this act, during the preceding taxable year, or which are exempt under the provisions of section 11, Title I, of this act.

That may be the corporation the Senator has in mind.

Mr. JONES. I have looked at that language in the amendment and I was just going to state that probably that language meets the objection made by the gentleman in his letter, because he argues on the theory that, for instance, steel stock that is worth $468 a share would have to pay exactly the same tax as stock that is worth only $2.50 a share, and he cites this company, which is a mining company, that have expended considerable money in development, and in fact everything they have raised they have spent in development. He says if this tax of 50 cents a thousand dollars is put on his tax of $5,000, they would have to raise it; that they have had no income. I take it even on that basis the lines to which the Senator from Florida just called attention would take care of the situation.

Mr. THOMAS. It was precisely that class of cases that prompted the amendment to which the Senator from Florida referred.

If I may be permitted a further word, there is another question that is decided in a number of cases in the State courts principally that has to do with respect to what a corporation's capital signifies—the aggregate of the sum subscribed, being that either paid in or agreed to be paid in by the stockholders.

Mr. JONES. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Colorado I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina it ought to made clear whether we intend to put a tax on the capital stock or whether it should apply simply to the capital.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me just a moment, the Senator from Colorado, I think, is mistaken in reference to the purpose of the committee. During the discussion it was proposed to make that capital stock. We discussed that and concluded that that would not be quite the proper standard, because a great many corporations issue a certain amount of stock paid in. One class is preferred stock and another class is common stock, and nothing is paid upon it at all. The stock does not represent money that is invested in the enterprise.

What I want to do is to place a tax of 50 cents a thousand on the money actually used in the industry in the nature of capital or surplus or undivided profits. For instance, a corporation is organized on a basis of $200,000 worth of stock, only $100,000 of that stock is paid for, only the $100,000 which was paid up was invested in the business, and that is what we intended to tax. If during the operation of the business they accumulated a surplus, that would be taxed. If they accumulated certain profits which they did not divide among their stockholders, that is a part of the undivided profits, and that we intended to tax. That was our intention.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may be permitted just a moment, whatever doubt there might be about the use of the word "capital" if standing alone is removed when you consider the further language of the amendment. It says:

Corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations shall pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital, surplus, and undivided profits used in any of the activities or functions of their business.

Very clearly this would be construed to mean a tax upon each thousand dollars of the capital invested, and it might be very burdensome.

I may suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, in the first place, it will require an appraisal of all the property of the corporation every year in order to ascertain the value of the property, for the property is the capital, I mean if its capital has been invested in that time. A corporation invests $100,000 in the construction of a building, and when they come to ascertain how much it should be taxed they must ascertain the value of that building, for it is their capital for that purpose. If the corporation bond $100,000 and invest it in their business, it becomes capital and would be taxed. A railroad company worth, we will assume, a million dollars, one-half represented by capital stock and one-half represented by bonds, would be taxed for a million dollars. There is no deduction.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will say to him another amendment was proposed by the committee. In the clause "including such sums as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds," and so forth, after the word "sums" the words "of capital, surplus, and undivided profits" were added.

Mr. OLIVER. We can not hear a word on this side that the Senator is saying.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say it is proposed to read "sums of capital, surplus, and undivided profits," showing that if the capital and surplus or undivided profits are invested in these things, the amount invested in the enumerated things, stocks and bonds and mortgages, are not to be taxed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not seen the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is right after the word "sums," inserting "of capital, surplus, and undivided profits"; that is to say, the sum of their capital, surplus, and undivided profits invested in bonds, stocks, and mortgages is not to be taxed in addition to the tax on the capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose it is invested in other kinds of property. Take a manufacturing concern. It has a million dollars which has been contributed as a part of the capital either through stock or through bonds. The money is used for the purpose of constructing a plant. What would be the capital of such a company?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a part of the capital invested in the manufacturing plant, and it would deplete their capital to that extent.

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely; that it what I say, and the capital is the value of the plant.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you included the one you would not include the other, because this is simply transferring the amount of money—taking an amount of money out of the capital, the surplus, and undivided profits, and investing it in something else. You have not added anything to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is intended to ascertain the value of property with which the corporation carries on business and tax it at the rate of 50 cents a thousand. That is the purpose, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the purpose to tax the actual capital surplus invested in the business, and no more. I will state to the Senator that I have sent for and will have it here in a minute the present law under which banks are taxed. There is a similar tax imposed upon banks. It is a tax of $1 upon the thousand instead of 50 cents, as in the bill, and practically exactly the same language is used there as here, except that the tax is $1 upon every thousand dollars of capital, surplus, and undivided profits instead of half a dollar. There has been no trouble about the administration of that law.

Mr. CUMMINS. As just indicated by the Senator from Colorado, when it is used in any of the activities or functions of their business I think you put a different interpretation upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that has been our purpose. Our purpose is that whatever capital may be actually invested in the business shall pay a tax of 50 cents upon every thousand dollars.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sorry I find myself out of agreement with my associate in regard to this provision. I think, as the chairman will recall, that at the end of one of our discussions I suggested an examination of the legal definition, and consequently the extent of the use of the word "capital." I availed myself of the first opportunity to do that, although I do not recall that I reported the result to the chairman or to any other member of the committee. But before doing that I consulted the law to which the Senator refers, the statute as now in force.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator did call it to our attention.

Mr. THOMAS (reading)—

First. Bankers shall pay $1 for each $1,000 of capital used or employed, and in estimating capital surplus and undivided profits shall be included. The amount of such annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits for the preceding fiscal year.

There is a proviso to that section of the present law "that any postal savings bank or savings bank having no capital stock and whose business is confined to receiving deposits," and so forth, "shall not be subject to this tax." The word "capital" there was evidently used, and intentionally so, as being the equivalent of capital stock; and I find that such are the authorities with regard to this subject in connection with tax laws.

Thus, in California, in Iowa, in Louisiana, and in New York it is held that in statutes of this kind capital and capital stock are used convertibly. This is not a tax, as I have stated, upon property. It is not a tax upon stock as such. The use of the expression is designed to fix a basis or measure for the levying of an excise tax, and as a consequence I feel that it is my duty to define my understanding of this provision and what I had in view in assenting to its adoption. It is the levying of 50 cents upon every thousand dollars of capital stock of the company, including its surplus and undivided profits. If it does not, it ought to be made that way, and I think it should be so written not only because it will avoid the inconvenience suggested by the Senator from Iowa but because if you do not make it that way you are going to levy this tax upon the debts of corporations as well as upon their capital.

Where a corporation borrows $250,000 and issues bonds for the same and that money is invested in its business you are going to levy 50 cents upon every thousand dollars of the $250,000 represented by bonds. I know the committee did not intend that. I know that no member of the committee intended that. Hence I must insist that the construction which I have given to the use of this language all along, justified, as it is, by the decisions, means that this tax will be levied upon corporations, using their capital stock, together with their surplus and the undivided profits, as the basis or measure of the tax provided for in this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, when I differ on a law question with the Senator from Colorado I have always very serious doubt as to whether I am right, but I do not understand this paragraph to mean at all what he says. I think the term "capital" has a distinct meaning.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not aspire to infallibility, and I will say to the Senator that I have quite as much respect for his legal opinion as he can possibly have for mine.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the term "capital" here means the actual money of the company ahead of its liabilities. The capital, surplus, and undivided profits are the assets of the company in excess of its liabilities.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if that is not substantially the same theory that was announced by the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senator from Colorado insisted that the term "capital" meant capital stock, and that the tax would follow the capital stock regardless of the value of the capital stock. I do not agree with that view at all. I think we used the term "capital" to avoid that very view, because we do not mean to tax the capital stock, we mean to tax the actual capital, the actual assets of the company. I do not think that money used by the company derived from a mortgage or a loan would be subject to the tax. I have taken this section up with the law officer of the Internal-Revenue Bureau and looked into the precedents, and he agrees with my view about its meaning.

Mr. OLIVER. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if it might not be well to put in some qualifying phrase.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think we have the proper language now. I think we have exactly the proper language to cover the result that I have described.

Mr. OLIVER. I agree with the Senator, but at the same time, since there is a disagreement between three of the ablest lawyers in the Senate as to the meaning of this phrase, would it not be well to put in such language as would show its exact intent and meaning, and bring it to a point where there would not be such a disagreement as has been expressed?

Mr. THOMAS. So far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to do that by the insertion of the word "stock" after the word "capital."

Mr. SIMMONS. I could not vote for that.

Mr. THOMAS. That certainly would clarify the doubt, if there be one, although not in the direction satisfactory to the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SIMMONS. When properly construed the language there means practically the same as does the language employed here. It says, "capital used or employed."

Mr. THOMAS. And yet, if the Senator will look at the proviso which exempts banks having no capital stock, he must draw the conclusion that "capital" as used in the body of the section is the equivalent of capital stock.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think that conclusion follows at all. They were simply exempting a certain class of banks—savings banks and postal banks—and they simply indicate that they exempt them because they do not have capital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MYERS in the chair). Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the amendment of the committee is agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the reading of the amendment has not been concluded, and I shall not insist on that being done, but I should like to hear something from the Senator in charge of the bill with regard to the necessity of this amendment, taken as a whole.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if the committee were setting out to tax corporations, it would have been the part of wisdom to settle upon some way of getting all the money that is wanted from the corporations by one method of taxation. This thing of multiplying taxes is inexpert, and, in my opinion, it is exceedingly unwise. I do not know how much money is expected from this source of taxation, but I do think that piling on one tax after another is not only irksome, but it is wrong. Corporations are taxed to the limit by the several States, and now the committee come in and in some cases pile three and four taxes upon one corporation under this one bill. I should like to hear some defense from the committee for this proposed amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if there is any class of capital in this country that has no right to complain of this bill it is the corporations. Individuals are taxed upon an entirely different basis with reference to their incomes from the tax imposed upon corporations with reference to their incomes. An individual must pay a flat tax of 2 cents under this bill up to $20,000. After that he has got to pay a constantly increasing surtax. The corporation simply pays a flat tax of 2 cents. It pays no surtax whatever. The only tax imposed upon corporations in this bill, except this little tax, is a flat tax of 2 cents, which, I say, is not so great as the tax imposed upon individuals.

This is not a tax upon corporations alone. This is a tax for the privilege of doing business; it is a license tax. All corporations are required to pay the same tax, to wit, only 50 cents upon $1,000 of capital. Then follow——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator let me finish the sentence? Then follow various and sundry license taxes upon individuals; on commission brokers so much; on pawnbrokers so much; theaters so much; on circuses so much. This is the same kind of tax with reference to corporations. It is no more burdensome than are the other license taxes imposed in this bill. I can not see any reason why it should be treated as an unusual or an extraordinary tax. It is simply a license tax, such as we impose upon individuals for doing certain kinds of business. I heard no complaint when we imposed a similar tax upon bankers in the last revenue bill and did not impose it upon other corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And we made it twice as high.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; it was twice as high on bankers. There was a great outcry on the part of bankers, but they never put their complaints on the ground that it was unjust to impose upon them a small tax for the privilege of doing business. They, however, based their complaints solely and exclusively upon the ground that the present law singled them out and imposed this license tax upon them, while it did not impose similar taxes upon any other corporation. After we eliminated that tax as to banks and put them in the same category with all other corporations in the United States they did not complain any further; and I have not had a complaint from any of the corporations against this specific tax since we adopted this amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, the defense of this legislation by the chairman of the committee is just about what I expected. I did not say there was anything unusual about the tax. On the contrary, I think it is the usual thing. The complaint about it is that it is piling one tax upon another and upon the same class of people.

The Senator says that the tax applies to all corporations alike. It does not do anything of the kind. It exempts corporations having a capital and surplus of less than $100,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, Mr. President; but it exempts that much of the capital of every corporation.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that very well; but I tell you, Mr. President, that it is so framed not because it will cost too much to collect the tax, but because the tax would otherwise hit too many people, would render too many people dissatisfied, and would take too many votes away from the party which is framing this legislation. That is the reason why the corporation having a capital under $100,000 is exempted. You want to cause as little dissatisfaction as you can by this legislation and to get as much money out of the pockets of the people as you can.

Talk about this being a just tax! Talk about any part of the bill being just! There is not a shadow of justice about the bill from beginning to end.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, we understand, Mr. President, that the Senator from Pennsylvania is opposed to any direct taxation whatever.

Mr. OLIVER. This is not direct taxation; it is coming out of the people who own these corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Pennsylvania thinks that all the money for the support of the Government ought to be raised from the customhouses and that those taxes ought to be exceedingly high, especially upon the products of the State of Pennsylvania——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. In order that that State might continue to enjoy the privilege of taxing the balance of the people of this country in the future to the extent that it has been permitted to do in the past.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I am sorry that the Senator from North Carolina has cast that imputation upon me. It is entirely unjust. I have never advocated in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania what I did not want to give to every other State in the country. Since the Senator has made the reference, however, I will say that the bill is especially framed to exempt his section of the country as far as possible from taxation and to impose it upon other sections. It is framed with that purpose in view. He himself had that purpose in view—to exempt his own people as far as he can from the payment of taxes and to impose the taxes upon the people of my State and upon other States similarly situated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I state emphatically that I have no such purpose as that, and the Senator is not justified in making any such statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment as amended be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 99, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

First. Corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations shall pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital, surplus, and undivided profits used in any of the activities or functions of their business, including such sums as may be invested in or loaned upon stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, or other securities. The amount of such annual tax shall in all cases be computed on the basis of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits for the preceding fiscal year, but excluding in the case of insurance companies such deposits and reserve funds as they are required by law or contract to maintain or hold for the protection of or payment to or apportionment among policyholders. Every corporation, joint-stock company, or association as defined and limited in section 10, Title I, of this act, shall be liable to this tax: Provided, That for the purpose of this tax an exemption of $99,000 shall be allowed from the capital, surplus, and undivided profits of each corporation: And provided further, That corporations actually paying the tax imposed by section 41 of Title III of this act shall be entitled to a credit as against the tax imposed by this paragraph equal to the amount of the tax so actually paid: And provided further, That this tax shall not be imposed upon any corporation not engaged in business or which had no net income, as defined in Title I of this act, during the preceding taxable year, or which are exempt under the provisions of section 11, Title I, of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" appear to have it.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for a division.

The amendment as amended was agreed to on a division.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 100, line 21, after the word "broker," to strike out "Provided, That any person having paid the special tax as a banker shall not be required to pay the special tax as a broker," so as to make the clause read:

Second. Brokers shall pay $30. Every person, firm, or company, whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, or other securities, for others, shall be regarded as a broker.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state that formerly there was a tax on banks. We have stricken out the tax on banks, and therefore this language was unnecessary.

Mr. THOMAS. It would not be fair to tax a private bank and not tax a banking corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. What I had in mind was whether the amendment striking out the proviso had been agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have just agreed to that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not understand the announcement, and therefore I desired to ascertain whether or not the amendment had been agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 101, after line 16, to strike out:

Sixth. Proprietors of theaters, museums, or concert halls, where a charge for admission is made, located in a city, town, or village with a population not exceeding 1,000, according to the last preceding census of the United States, shall pay $10; located in a city, town, or village having a population in excess of 1,000 but not in excess of 2,000, shall pay $15; located in a city, town, or village having a population in excess of 2,000 and not in excess of 3,000, shall pay $20; located in a city, town, or village having a population in excess of 3,000, shall pay one-half of 1 per cent of their gross receipts from admission. Every edifice used for the purpose of dramatic or operatic or other representations, plays, or performances, for admission to which entrance money is received, not including halls or armories rented or used occasionally for concerts or theatrical representation, shall be regarded as a theater.

Every proprietor of such theater, museum, or concert hall, located in a city, town, or village having a population in excess of 3,000 inhabitants shall, on or before the 15th day of March, 1917, and on or before the 15th day of June, September, December, and March thereafter, make a return under oath to the collector of internal revenue of the district wherein they are located, stating the gross receipts from admissions for the preceding quarter. The collector shall, within five days of receipt of the return, notify the proprietor of the amount of the tax for which such person is liable, and such person shall pay the tax to the collector on or before the 1st day of the next month.

Sixth. Proprietors of theaters, museums, and concert halls, where a charge for admission is made, having a seating capacity of not more than 250, shall pay $25; having a seating capacity of more than 250 and not exceeding 500, shall pay $50; having a seating capacity exceeding 500 and not exceeding 800, shall pay $75; having a seating capacity of more than 800, shall pay $100. Every edifice used for the purpose of dramatic or operatic or other representations, plays, or performances, for admission to which entrance money is received, not including halls or armories rented or used occasionally for concerts or theatrical representations, shall be regarded as a theater: Provided, That in cities, towns, or villages of 5,000 inhabitants or less the amount of such payment shall be one-half of that above stated: Provided further, That whenever any such edifice is under lease at the passage of this act, the tax shall be paid by the lessee, unless otherwise stipulated between the parties to said lease.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will explain to the Senate just what is accomplished by that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator to allow the amendment to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the Senator will want to do that after I give him a word of explanation. Let me explain it this time, even if it goes over until to-morrow.

The existing law was criticized because it placed a tax per seat upon amusement houses. The smaller cities insisted that they had amusement houses about as large as some in the larger cities, but did not use them half so much, and that to tax their amusement houses at the same rate as amusement houses in larger places was really taxing them twice as much on their amusements as the amusements in larger places. To try to avoid this the House adopted a gross income tax of 1 per cent; but this seemed to us unjust. We have felt that net income, rather than gross income, was the fairer basis for taxing. Investigation led us to believe that it would be almost impossible as to many of the smaller amusement places that did not keep books to ascertain the net income. Therefore, we propose to reenact the existing law, modified with the provision that in towns of 5,000 inhabitants or less the tax per seating capacity shall be only half of that in larger places. We were simply trying to equalize the effect of the tax, based upon the theory of the extent of use of the theater. That is the change we have made.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I noticed that that was the change, Mr. President. I think, as far as the proviso is concerned, the change that has already been made is a very good one, indeed; but I do not want at this late time of day to take up the discussion of the question itself. Therefore I ask that it go over until to-morrow, so that we can proceed with the balance of this subdivision without the necessity of suggesting the absence of a quorum, as I should like a vote upon it when it is passed upon by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). The Senator from Utah requests that the amendment be passed over. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that this change in the law pointed out by the Senator from Georgia strikes me as eminently fair and just. It is a modification of the old law that did not make a fair distinction. What the Senator has stated has come under my own observation in the little town where I live. The old law worked a great hardship. The distinction that has been made here by cutting down the license fee by half in these small towns is eminently just and fair, and I am very glad the committee made this change.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a splendid amendment.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 104, line 18, after the word "played," to strike out "and that are open to the public with or without price," so as to make the clause read:

Ninth. Proprietors of bowling alleys and billiard rooms shall pay $5 for each alley or table. Every building or place where bowls are thrown or where games of billiards or pool are played shall be regarded as a bowling alley or a billiard room, respectively.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Georgia if that is intended to make a man liable to this tax if he has a billiard table in his own house.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. I think it makes all clubs and places liable where billiard tables are kept for use but to which the public are not freely invited, only the membership being invited.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems to me that this would include private tables. I do not care particularly, because a man who can afford to have a billiard table in his house can perhaps afford to pay the tax.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There were two views of it. One was that the language would include private tables, and one was that the language would include clubhouses. My view is that it includes clubhouses. Some thought that it included private tables as well. So far as I was concerned, I did not care which view was taken, although I think the proper view is that it does not apply to a man's private table in his own house; but if it does, it is all right with me. I do not care which view is had of it.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not particular.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe it will apply to every bowling alley or every billiard table that may be in the United States. It says:

Every building or place where bowls are thrown or where games of billiard or pool are played shall be regarded as a bowling alley or a billiard room, respectively.

I have not any objection whatever to putting the $5 tax upon every billiard table that there is in the United States, whether it be in a hovel or in a palace or in a public building of any kind.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither have I. I think that is what we intended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 4, after the word "cigarettes," to insert "including little cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand," so as to read:

Manufacturers of cigarettes, including little cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand, shall each pay, etc.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to have that amendment, as well as the long amendment on the next page, go over until to-morrow. I have received a very vigorous protest from the manufacturers of what are termed "stogies" in our section, and I have not yet been able to ascertain just exactly the ground of the protest. It may be that these sections will not be open to the objection that they raise. I will investigate the matter to-night.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say to the Senator that I do not think the paragraph he is asking to have go over applies to stogies. I think that is a paragraph that we have already gone over. If it is, I am perfectly willing to have the adoption of the paragraph reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. The stogies would weigh more than 3 pounds per thousand. These are the little cigars that are made.

Mr. OLIVER. I suppose that is what is called an all-tobacco cigarette.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is really an all-tobacco cigarette.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I will withdraw my request so far as this is concerned. Which paragraph does the Senator thinks covers stogies?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know just into which class it may fall. I have studied this paragraph to find out what falls in it, as we are changing the House provision. We added the little cigar, because otherwise it would fall into the class of actual cigars and would be taxed more than it would be fair to tax it. We brought the little cigar, which is a cigarette cigar, into this paragraph.

Mr. SMOOT. An all-tobacco cigarette.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. An all-tobacco cigarette; that expresses it correctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. Whatever section does apply to the stogies I should like to have open to reconsideration in case I find it necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The change that we made from 3 cents to 8 cents for every 10,000 cigarettes was due to the fact that we did not think the 3 cents brought it up to the proper standard. The existing law fixes the price in grades and quantities up to 100,000,000. Beyond that it makes no increase One manufacturer, say, makes 5,000,000,000. We are undertaking by this 8-cent tax to obtain exactly the same sum from these cigarettes that would have been derived had we continued to charge per 100,000,000 on to the 5,000,000,000 production. By putting it at so much per 10,000 we equalized it as to everybody according to production, and we raised the same sum that we would have raised had the former law extended on by 100,000,000 to the 5,000,000,000 producers.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, out of order I wish to offer an amendment as a new section on page 144, after section 102. I do this at this time because I may not be able to be here to-morrow, and I desire to be present when this matter is considered. I ask that the Secretary may read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

The SECRETARY. On page 144, after section 102, it is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. 103. That whenever during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that under the laws, regulations, or practices of any country, colony, or dependency contrary to the law and practice of nations, the importation into their own or any other country, dependency, or colony of any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States and not injurious to health or morals is prevented or restricted the President is authorized and empowered, within his discretion, to prohibit or restrict during the period such prohibition or restriction is in force, the importation into the United States of similar articles or in case the United States does not import similar articles from that country then other articles, products of such country, dependency, or colony as in his opinion the public interest may require; and in such case he shall make proclamation stating the article or articles which are prohibited from importation into the United States; and any person or persons who shall import, or attempt or conspire to import, or be concerned in importing, such article or articles into the United States contrary to the prohibition in such proclamation, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $2,000 nor more than $50,000, or to imprisonment not to exceed two years, or both, in the discretion of the court. The President may change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation in his discretion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this amendment has been submitted to the Finance Committee. On behalf of the committee I will accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator mean the amendment that has just been offered?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over until we can read it.

Mr. JAMES. I will state to the Senator the reason why I desire it acted on.

Mr. SMOOT. I really did not hear the amendment read.

Mr. JAMES. I think I can state to the Senator just what the amendment it. It will take only a moment. It provides that in case any Government, during a war to which the United States is not a party, contrary to the law and practice of nations discriminates against the products of the soil or industries of the United States, and prevents such goods or products from going into that or any other country, then the President, when satisfied that that is the case, has a right to retaliate by prohibiting such articles or any article from that country being imported into this country.

Mr. SMOOT. What effect would that have upon our treaties—for instance, the question of the favored-nation clause? Would it not conflict with those treaties if that authority were granted to the President?

Mr. JAMES. I will say to the Senator that this amendment has been submitted to the State Department and meets with its approval. It is not in conflict with any treaty at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that if it can be carried out without conflict with treaties I am in favor of the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if any treaty violation is involved, the violation is from the offending country, not from the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. If that were true, Mr. President, it would have the effect of relieving the United States from any obligation it may have under the treaty.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly no country could claim that we were violating a favored-nation clause when they themselves were violating such a treaty by discrimination against goods or products of the United States, or claim such protection, when they had first violated the treaty, if such a treaty had existed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am very cordially in favor of the amendment. I think it many ways we leave our administrative officers helpless to guard our commercial rights.

Mr. SMOOT. So am I in favor of it, if it is not subject to the objection to which I have referred.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it can be handled without any trouble. I have given a good deal of thought to the subject of our international relations, and I believe it will help the State Department in diplomatic negotiations looking toward guarding the rights of American commerce. Of course any administration would be very careful about its use and regardful of our treaty obligations; but to-day the State Department negotiates in many respects with reference to a disregard of our commercial rights with hands tied, the opposing power being conscious of the fact that no authority has been vested in the State Department or in the President to use our commercial strength. The British Government, through its Privy Council, has almost unlimited power.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall not object to the adoption of the amendment at this time, but I do think it is worthy of most serious consideration. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that if it can be carried out, and if it does not conflict with our treaties with other countries, I should be most happy to have it become a part of the law of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator is not aware of the fact that on Saturday last I introduced an amendment, prepared also by the State Department, much more extensive than this, drawn to some degree in the same language, but designed to arm the Government with the power to retaliate by way of reprisals whenever such acts on the part of foreign Governments as are illustrated by the so-called black-list order shall occur. I hope the Senator will also find himself in accord with that amendment and with the purpose for which it is intended.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. OLIVER. I withdraw the suggestion for the present, then; but I do not propose that an amendment so important as this shall be acted on without careful consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator object to its consideration now, and ask that it go over?

Mr. OLIVER. I ask, then, that the amendment may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. JAMES. Of course, the Senator has the power to do that, but I can not see the slightest objection. I know of no treaty in the world that this amendment would interfere with.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not want it acted upon to-night.

Mr. OLIVER. It is a new thing to me.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of calling a quorum, because we can not get one.

Mr. JAMES. The reason why I called up the amendment this afternoon was that I may have to be absent from the city to-morrow, and I certainly shall have to be absent the following day. I can stay here until to-morrow, and I should like to know if the Senator would have any objection to calling it up in the morning.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that after studying the amendment it may be that I will have no objection to it. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator must go away and is not paired, to break my pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and pair with him, or do anything in the world to accommodate him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that when the session of the Senate closes this afternoon, it be by recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate recur to page 79 of the printed bill under consideration; and I move that all of subsection (2), on page 79, being lines 10 to 19, inclusive, be stricken out. I move to amend that section in that way.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. A motion was made by the Senator from Georgia that when the Senate ends the present session it be by recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. What became of that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was carried.

Mr. STONE. Was it so announced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was so announced.

Mr. STONE. I did not hear it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Montana that that whole section has been laid over for the time being.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that we take it up now.

Mr. THOMAS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

CONDITIONS IN IRON-ORE MINING TOWNS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th instant, copies of four reports, received by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service from Passed Asst. Surg. Robert Olesen, embodying the observations made by Dr. Olesen and Asst. Surg. Joseph Bolten of sanitary conditions in certain iron-ore mining towns in Michigan and Minnesota, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FIELDS, Mr. CALDWELL, and Mr. GREENE of Vermont managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 14391. An act authorizing the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Madison, Wis., and for other purposes; and

H. R. 17235. An act granting the consent of Congress to W. H. Crosby, W. H. Andrews, E. G. Connette, Daniel Good, Henry May, Robert C. Gaupp, Edward Kener, jr., William F. MacGlashan, and William A. Morgan to construct a bridge across Niagara River within or near the city limits of Buffalo, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 13391) entitled "An act to amend certain sections of the act entitled 'Federal reserve act,' approved December 23, 1913," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for prohibition in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. HARDING, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 1636. An act for the relief of Karen S. Sorenson and James Lyle (Rept. No. 834); and

H. R. 8452. An act for the relief of Charles L. Moore (Rept. No. 833).

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 6968) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the State of Tennessee two brass cannon with carriage; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 6969) for the relief of Mary E. Woodward (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TAGGART (for Mr. JOHNSON of Maine):

A bill (S. 6970) to waive the age limit in the appointment of Frederick P. Rogers, of Bangor, Me., as a second lieutenant in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JAMES:

A bill (S. 6971) granting a pension to Herbert G. Hoots (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 6972) to repeal provisions of Interstate Commerce Commission and dividing same into sections and for giving jurisdiction to raise or change rates of wages to employees in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 6973) to enable Frank B. Lammons to take the examination for second lieutenant; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 6974) granting a pension to Eva A. Trager; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) expressing sentiment of right to increase or decrease rates of freight and passenger compensation by Interstate Commerce Commission under certain circumstances; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KERN submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to consider and favorably adjudicate claims of trust companies or other claimants for refund of taxes illegally collected on capital, surplus, or undivided profits, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 17645), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I offer a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The resolution (S. Res. 260) was read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That in order to afford sufficient time for the intelligent consideration of the legislation suggested in the President's message to Congress of August 29, the Senate of the United States hereby requests the representatives of the railway employees who have fixed upon September 4 for the commencement of a general strike, to postpone the date for the beginning of such strike for one week, and that a copy of this resolution be immediately forwarded by the Secretary of the Senate to the said representatives having the matter of a strike in their charge.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a compendium of the farm-loan act showing the practical workings of it. It consists of just about four pages.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that the Department of Agriculture has already printed Circular No. 60, and not only the information is the same as what the Senator has presented but it contains a great deal of other information in relation to the same subject matter.

Mr. CHILTON. I want this to go in the RECORD; that is all.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARLES TOWN, W. VA., August 23, 1916.

Hon. W. E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am handing you herewith a luminous abridgment of the recent farm-loan act, together with the closely related Federal reserve bank act, the former having been made possible by the latter. Both enactments are so exceedingly creditable to our Congress that I wish to lift up my voice now in praise of the broad spirit of prophetic wisdom which prompted their conception. Both, however, being much too complex and involved for clear and quick appreciation of the average citizen, this synopsis is prepared by a gentleman who has deeply studied both measures, and it represents a true reflex of the essentials of both acts. It is educational and should be widely disseminated.

Yours, sincerely, A. W. BYINGTON.

THE FARM-LOAN ACT.

On July 17, 1916, President Wilson signed what is known as the farm-loan act, a measure of such tremendous significance as to be hardly second in importance to that wisest of all financial legislation known as the Federal reserve bank act. These two acts, operating in harmony, render it practically impossible for any interest or combination of interests to cause a money stringency or produce a financial panic, and free the farmer forever from the clutches of money sharks and make it easy for him to procure long-time loans at low interest, and repayable in easy installments. The far-reaching effect of these two measures can hardly be estimated, so great is their scope and so powerful the impulse they give to widespread and lasting prosperity.

This latest act—the farm-loan act—provides two systems for making loans—the Federal Land Bank System and the Joint Stock Bank System. The Federal Land Bank System will consist of 12 banks located in 12 farm districts, each having a subscribed capital of not less than $750,000 in shares of $5, and all under control of the Federal Farm Loan Board, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury and four members appointed by the President. The money comes from the sale of shares of bank stock and of bonds secured by first mortgages on farm land. If the bank stock offered is not all sold within 30 days, what remains shall be bought in by the United States Treasury. The United States, however, will get no dividend on the stock it holds. This provision is intended to make sure that the bank gets proper capital to start business.

Local farmers are to form loan associations composed of borrowers. They will be shareholders in the bank and will share in dividends. The bank that has to borrow money to lend can not charge for loans more than 1 per cent more than it pays for such money. Full information as to procedure in securing a loan will be furnished prospective borrowers by each Federal land bank or its branch in any particular locality.

How it works: Brown borrows $1,000, to be repaid, say, in 20 years; his first annual payment would be $80.24, $50 of which is interest.

In tabular form the account will appear thus:

	Total payment.	Interest at 5 per cent.	Paid on principal	Still due
First year	$80.24	$50.00	$30.24	$969.76
Second year	80.24	48.48	31.75	938.01
Third year	80.24	46.90	33.34	904.67
Fourth year	80.24	45.23	35.01	869.66
Fifth year	80.24	43.48	36.75	832.90
Sixth year	80.24	41.64	38.59	794.31
Seventh year	80.24	39.71	40.52	753.79
Eighth year	80.24	37.68	42.55	711.23
Ninth year	80.24	35.56	44.68	666.55
Tenth year	80.24	33.32	46.91	619.64
Eleventh year	80.24	30.98	49.26	570.39
Twelfth year	80.24	28.51	51.72	518.67
Thirteenth year	80.24	25.93	54.31	464.33
Fourteenth year	80.24	23.21	57.02	407.31
Fifteenth year	80.24	20.36	59.87	347.43
Sixteenth year	80.24	17.37	62.87	284.60
Seventeenth year	80.24	14.28	66.01	218.59
Eighteenth year	80.24	10.93	69.31	149.28
Nineteenth year	80.24	7.46	72.78	76.50
Twentieth year	80.33	3.83	76.50	[1]

[1] Paid out.

It will be seen that the interest reduces annually and at same time payments on principal increase.

Had he borrowed $1,000 in the ordinary way he would have paid, besides fees and commission, $1,000 in interest and still would owe the original $1,000 borrowed. Under this system he pays no commission.

The only restriction is that the loan must be for the building up and equipping the farm and its business, and not for some enterprise wholly disconnected therewith.

If more than $1,000 is desired, the principle indicated in above figures will prevail, the simple multiplication of said figures by the number of thousands giving the result.

THE JOINT-STOCK BANK SYSTEM.

The banks under this system are authorized to lend direct to borrowers on farm mortgages and to issue farm-loan bonds for capital. These banks will be capitalized at $250,000 or more and will be supervised by the same board, but they get no financial assistance from the United States Government. They are not restricted as to the purpose of the loans made. They can not charge over 6 per cent and must provide for the same plan of easy repayment. They can take no commission or fee for making the loan.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on August 29, 1916, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 19. An act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce;

S. 381. An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands;

S. 6740. An act to correct the military record of Matthew C. Butler, jr.; and

S. 6924. An act to provide for the maintenance of a training camp on the military reservation of Fort Douglas, Utah.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17235. An act granting the consent of Congress to W. H. Crosby, W. H. Andrews, E. G. Connette, Daniel Good, Henry May, Robert C. Gaupp, Edward Kener, jr., William F. MacGlashan, and William A. Morgan to construct a bridge across Niagara River within or near the city limits of Buffalo, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m., Wednesday, August 30, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 31, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 30, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, whose loving heart is ever open to the appeals of Thy children, we seek Thee at the beginning of this new legislative day that we may be guided by the holy spirit of truth with clear vision, that each legislative act may be in consonance with the eternal principles which have been woven into the foundation of our Republic, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, that its superstructure may not be weakened but made stronger, that it may stand the strain of all the forces from within or from without which may be hurled against it and so be worthy of the trust reposed in us. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes the gentleman would withhold that for just a minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Well, I will withhold it for a minute.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order——

Mr. EDWARDS. But, Mr. Speaker, it has been withheld.

The SPEAKER. It was withheld for one purpose. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 235 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3180. An act to authorize the appointment of Clarence C. Kress to the grade of captain, United States Army Medical Corps.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to bill (S. 5987) to amend subsection 11 of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 600. An act to validate title to the town site of McCabe, in the State of Montana;

H. R. 10251. An act authorizing the Kansas City & Memphis Railway & Bridge Co. to make settlement with Crittenden County, Ark., and for other purposes;

H. R. 13835. An act to authorize the county commissioners of Aitkin County, Minn., and the town board of Logan Township, in said county and said State, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River on the line between sections 26 and 27, township 49 north, range 25 west, fourth principal meridian;

H. R. 13926. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a district judge, district attorney, and marshal for the western district of South Carolina, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1915, so as to provide for terms of the district court to be held at Anderson, S. C.;

H. R. 17375. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved June 17, 1910; and

H. J. Res. 292. Joint resolution proposing to amend section 2971 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

THE SHIPPING BILL.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand, Mr. Speaker, under the agreement or understanding yesterday afternoon we would proceed with Senate amendments to the shipping bill (H. R. 15455).

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is Senate amendments to H. R. 15455. Under the agreement the gentleman has 10 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts 26 minutes. Does the gentleman desire to go ahead?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET]. [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 48 to the shipping bill is in all probability the most important and far-reaching matter that has been brought to the attention of this Congress. This legislation embraced in amendment 48 to the shipping bill is an assertion of American sovereignty at a time when possibly the assertion of American sovereignty, although right, correct, and patriotic, is nevertheless a most serious matter. The amendment as it comes to us from the Senate, known as the Thomas amendment, bearing the name of the distinguished Senator from Colorado, is correct in principle and as a Republican I rejoice in the fact that I can support an amendment coming from a Member upon the opposite side, and if it can not be strengthened I shall support the amendment in the form in which it is. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] will offer an amendment not differing in any wise in principle from the Thomas amendment but strengthening the Thomas amendment in two particulars.

The Thomas amendment is defective in two particulars. It protects only shipments by citizens of the United States, and it merely authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to refuse clearances to vessels without directing him to do so. I for one do not believe that the United States of America ought to make scraps of paper of its treaties. [Applause.] There are 14 nations amongst the belligerents. Nine of those 14 nations have commercial treaties with us, including Great Britain, France, Germany, and Austria, and those commercial treaties give them the right when their citizens or subjects are domiciled in the United States to do business in the United States in the same way that our own citizens do; and we have reciprocal treaties with them. That particular provision in the Thomas amendment therefore tears up every one of our nine commercial treaties pro tanto. The Sutherland amendment applies not to the citizenship of the goods but to the fact that they are shipped from an American port and therefore gives the protection to which they are entitled to firms domiciled in America.

Also, I do think that in a matter of this importance we ought not to cast the burden upon an executive officer when we declare a thing to be wrong—the burden of the importunities, that would come to him in specific cases, not to enforce the law. If a thing is wrong, then let the remedy be applied equally without fear and without favor and against everyone, and that the Sutherland amendment does. Outside of those particulars it is not essentially different from the Thomas amendment.

What is the situation that these two amendments, differing only in the way I have indicated, seek to remedy? It is this: As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] so aptly said on the floor the other day, we can not ship from our own country a bale of cotton or a box of matches without the consent of the British Government. I will give you an exact illustration of a man whom we know. A Member of this body, my colleague, Mr. GOULD, a manufacturer of pumps, has had a customer in the Argentine for 20 years. The other day he desired to ship pumps in the regular way to that customer. Not an American ship would take those American goods from an American manufacturer to a customer of 20 years standing because the British Government said they should not. You can not get a bank in any seaboard city to accept for collection a draft on any one of the 1,500 persons and firms on the British black list. And unless we pass this legislation we are just as much a commercial colony of Great Britain as is Canada.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I am very much in sympathy with what the gentleman is saying. I will vote for anything to strengthen this amendment. What would be wrong with the proposition to strike out the word "authorized" and use the word "directed"?

Mr. BENNET. Why, Mr. Speaker, I would vote for that. It would make it stronger. I am very frank to say to the gentleman that I would vote for it. I will vote for the Sutherland amendment. I hope to get one or the other. If I can not vote for that, I will vote for the Thomas amendment.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman believe that if the word "directed" was substituted for the word "authorized" the amendment would carry more force and more power?

Mr. BENNET. Why, certainly; and the Congress of the United States ought to commence to realize that they are the lawmaking body, and the duty of the Executive is simply to execute the laws which the Congress passes. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Does the gentleman believe that it would benefit American commerce if the word "authorized" was changed to "directed" merely, and still leave it so that this restriction would apply only to American ships and not to other regular transportation ships?

Mr. BENNET. Yes; I believe that. Now, there are some gentlemen who say—men who are not affected themselves—it might discommode more people to pass this than are discommoded at present. That is a narrow view. Unless we take the position as a Nation that an injury to one is the concern of all we have ceased to be an independent, sovereign nation. [Applause.] Our merchants in New York before the Revolution, when the British Government put an embargo on the merchants of Boston and attempted to drive the trade of New England to the port of New York, to the great financial benefit of the merchants of New York, met in a coffeehouse in Pearl Street and passed a resolution unanimously that they would not as fellow Americans take advantage of this oppression of their New England brethren, and that they would refuse to handle any business coming to them from a source like that. The Americans in Virginia prior to the War of the Revolution had not one single grievance with Great Britain that they could not have settled by accommodation; and so it can be said of all the coast south of that; but they took the patriotic American ground that we were one people, and because there were wrongs in Pennsylvania and New York and New England which could not be righted those gentlemen from the South struck hands with the gentlemen from the North in pursuit of a common Americanism, forgetting, as I hope they will do to-day, all factional, political, or sectional differences, and asserting, as we have in the past, that America is America and that American rights are American rights. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that I can agree with my good friend from New York [Mr. BENNET] upon one proposition of his speech. To change the word "authorized" to "directed" might be of benefit to the amendment, but as I believe one of the chief objections to the amendment lies in the fact that this restriction applies only to citizens of the United States, as I gather from a somewhat hasty reading of the amendment, this restriction applies only to American ships. If that be true, that is the chief defect of this amendment. Why, gentlemen, at the close of this war we will not only have to build up American commerce but we will be required to protect American commerce.

Can we protect American commerce by placing restrictions upon American ships—restrictions that do not apply to their rivals, restrictions that would drive American ships from the seas? Three-fourths, I believe, of all the regular established routes of transportation are absolutely in the control of foreigners to-day. Suppose we endeavored to establish American lines to compete with them, and the restrictions of this law apply only to American ships and not to foreign ships. Is that Americanism? Is that building up American commerce? Will that be an encouragement to American industries? Will that build American ships? Will that be an encouragement to American organizations to put lines in operation in competition with the great organized lines of Europe? It occurs to me not; and so I think it is as essential to modify this amendment by making it apply to all ships on regular lines that clear from our ports as it is that it shall apply to American ships.

Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that those who formulated this bill and these amendments have had little thought with regard to the real interests of America in all these matters, in so far as the commercial interests are concerned.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. In what respect does the amendment not apply to all vessels?

Mr. TOWNER. To all vessels?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. It reads "to any vessel."

Mr. TOWNER. This is a restriction, I will say to my friend, and it is a restriction that applies by the terms of the act to any citizen of the United States. This, of course, does not make it apply to any foreign ships or any foreign line of vessels doing business in the United States.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please repeat that statement? I did not catch it.

Mr. TOWNER. I would rather that the gentleman would take it up in his own time, but I will answer any question the gentleman may propound.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, no.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call attention also to the first amendment. This first amendment provides:

A cargo boat commonly called an ocean tramp shall not be deemed such "common carrier by water in foreign commerce."

It is a well-known fact that from 60 to 75 per cent of all the trade and commerce is now carried in tramp ships from ports of the United States. The effect of this amendment is to exclude all of such vessels from all of the regulatory features of this act.

Now, what are some of these regulatory features of the act—regulatory features that apply only to American ships, regulatory features that do not apply to tramp ships, regulatory features that do bind our shippers, but will not bind foreign shippers and will not apply to tramp vessels? What are some of them? The first of them is section 14 of this act, on page 15. The first regulatory feature that is a restriction on American commerce is "that no common carrier by water shall directly or indirectly"—and that applies only to American shipping and not to foreign shipping and tramp shipping—

That no common carrier by water shall directly or indirectly—first, pay or allow or enter into any combination, agreement, or understanding, expressed or implied, to pay or allow, a deferred rebate to any shipper.

That is a restriction that applies to American ships. That is not a restriction that applies to any tramp ships, although they are now doing, as I said, from 60 to 75 per cent of all of our business.

The second restriction on American commerce is that they shall not use "a fighting ship, either separately or in conjunction with any other carrier, through agreement or otherwise." The term "fighting ship" in this connection means a vessel used in a particular trade by a carrier or group of carriers for the purpose of reducing or preventing competition by driving any carrier out of the trade. No American ship can do that, but all foreign and tramp ships may do it. If this is a United States provision for the protection of shippers of America, why should it not apply to all those ships that clear from our ports, instead of applying only to American ships?

The third restriction is that they shall not "retaliate against any shipper by refusing, or threatening to refuse, space accommodations," and so forth. That applies only to American ships. Why should it not apply to all ships sailing from our ports?

The fourth restriction is that they shall not "make any unfair or unjustly discriminatory contract with any shipper based on the volume of freight offered," and so forth.

In other words, these regulatory features are made as restrictions on American ships and shipowners and do not apply to others. I am not condemning the restrictions. They may be fair, although I very much question whether or not they will be applicable under the conditions of our foreign commerce. But certainly it is not defensible to say that they shall apply to Americans, as restrictions upon them, and not apply to foreign commerce, that carries so large a proportion of our trade.

In fact, I think we are justified in saying, gentlemen, that this bill from beginning to end will not and can not operate to encourage American commerce or American shipping; that it will only discourage men who desire to invest in it; that it will be a hindrance and not a help. And I very well believe that the first action this Congress would take, if it could take action when the real competition begins at the close of this war, would be to repeal this act in its entirety, from beginning to end. [Applause on the Republican side.] At least I am quite sure that the succeeding Congress, which will be a Republican Congress, will repeal this act, because it will find that it is a millstone about the neck of American commerce, and not a help. [Applause on the Republican side.] I believe that they will find that almost every provision of this act is a hindrance, and can not possibly be a benefit to American commerce. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not more time to speak on the Senate amendments to this bill, but I have given to some able opponents of the Senate amendments an opportunity to fire a few shots into the same.

Now, I am going to talk plain business to the Members of the House. Gentlemen, the issue is between the Republican Party and the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party favors this infernal bill with worse than infernal amendments made by the Senate [applause on the Republican side], and if I find a Republican registered for these amendments sent to us from the Senate when we take a vote on the amendments I will put him down with the Democratic Party straight. [Applause on the Republican side.] I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House and the country to the fact that the Republican Party is opposed to the admission of foreign-built vessels to the coastwise trade of the United States, and the Democratic Party, by its votes in this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol, throws all our ports open to the competition of the low-paid labor of all foreign countries. I can not understand how any red-blooded American can indorse the position of the Democratic Party on the Senate amendments to section 9, but the responsibility is theirs.

Gentlemen, it is stated in the biography of Henry Clay that shortly after the Revolution the Tammany Society in New York passed a resolution that they would not buy any article made abroad, especially any articles made in England. I honor the Tammany Society for the record they made then regarding the proposition of buying goods made abroad when the country was a struggling Nation. Many another good Democrat at that time held the same view. To-day at the close of this debate we shall vote on one of the most important bills ever presented in this Congress. The amendments will pass, but the law will be very short lived. There will be a new House of Representatives, a new Senate, and a new President of the United States after the 4th of March, 1917. [Applause on the Republican side.] And when we get possession of the Government we will wipe off the statute books some of this infernal legislation that you have put into law. [Applause and laughter.] Oh, you gentlemen on the Democratic side can laugh, but the ides of November are coming, and when the 11th day of September comes, and the vote is taken in Maine, gentlemen of the Democratic Party, you will be utterly overwhelmed there. Mark my words. I put that statement on record here and now.

Mr. GORDON. Look out, now; that is not very far off.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am a good predictor and forecaster, and I have been a political forecaster for a great many years. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, we have public law No. 175, which authorized the President of the United States to suspend the provision of law requiring surveys, inspections, and measurements by officers of the United States of foreign-built vessels admitted under the registry act and under that act. Why, gentlemen, how much discretion did the President of the United States use? What were the vessels that he admitted under that act? They were vessels of the Standard Oil Co. They were vessels of the United Fruit Co., which companies I have heard denounced on the other side of the aisle as being a part of a great monopoly. The President of the United States gave authority for English officers to run those vessels, to the deprivation of American officers. My objection to the action of President Wilson was that he hastened under the discretion granted him to give preference to foreign officers, in the face of the fact that there was a large number of American officers idle, and Capt. Wescott is my authority for the statement that he had submitted a list of idle American officers to the President.

This bill has section 5 in it, which provides that this board is authorized to have ships constructed in American yards and navy yards—the American yards are full of business and the navy yards are full of business—or elsewhere, which means that they can go and spend this $50,000,000 in Japan or China, or any other place where they can hire people at from 15 to 25 cents a day, for they will stretch their authority in every possible way, and there is a good deal of chance in this bill.

I tell you, my friends, this bill ought to be defeated. Therefore I am going to call on every Republican to vote against it. There is going to be a presidential election, and you gentlemen want to be pretty careful how you vote. [Laughter and applause.] You want to vote so as to put the Republicans together. The Republicans are united to-day, and the Democratic Party can not understand it. They think they have got a chance to win. They are doomed to the greatest thrashing they have had in 25 years. I tell you, gentlemen, you have not reelected a President in 84 years. Just think of it! You have not reelected a President in 84 years, and you are not going to break the record this year, and it is your own work that will be responsible for the defeat that stares you in the face.

Now, I want to say a word about these amendments to this bill that were put on in the Senate. They undertook last year to put these amendments on this bill, to admit foreign-built vessels to the coatswise trade; but the Senate had some patriotic Democrats in it, and quite a number of Republicans, and they beat that proposition 2 to 1. To-day, doctoring this bill so as to make it satisfactory to all Democrats, and under orders from the White House, issued by the President and forwarded by his son-in-law, the Secretary of the Treasury, they deliberately voted to admit into the coastwise trade of the United States foreign-built vessels. The interest of the Democratic Party in the bill and amendments principally is in the appointment of five persons with the authority to draw salaries for a few brief months.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is rather amusing in his attitude toward this legislation. He would read out of the Republican Party the Republicans who voted for this bill when it passed the House, but I do not think they will permit him to do so. He should be more charitable toward his erring brethren.

It is interesting also to note that the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for the ship-registry act of August 18, 1914. I introduced that bill and it passed the House under suspension of the rules and not a vote was cast against it. It was an emergency measure. Yet the gentleman is inveighing against that bill to-day. He voted for the seamen's law, which passed this House under suspension of the rules with not a vote against it. And as a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, charged with the investigation of the Shipping Trust, he joined in a report which recommended to the Congress legislation regulating shipping along the lines proposed in this bill. Of course he has changed his mind, which he has a right to do; but he has not been consistent, and I do not think he ought to lecture his colleagues because they do not follow him.

It is said that the amendment now pending, if agreed to, will be a menace to our shipbuilding industry. Is that true? Vessels are now being built cheaper in American shipyards than in foreign shipyards, and I believe that condition will continue for years to come. Our shipyards are building vessels now on foreign account. A gentleman from the Pacific coast was in my office the other day, who said he had sold two American-built ships to a company in Norway. On May 1, 1916, there were 1,129,014 tons of steel vessels under construction or under contract to be built in American shipyards, and on June 30, 1916, we had 3,135 vessels of 2,194,470 gross tons under the American flag engaged in the foreign trade, the largest tonnage building or engaged in our foreign trade any time in the history of our country since the Civil War. Yet it is said that this legislation, which has been pending for two years past, is a menace to the shipbuilding industry. Our shipbuilding industry is more flourishing right now than it has been at any time since the Civil War, as the following tables will show:

Steel merchant vessels under construction or under contract to be built in the United States on May 1, 1916.

MILWAUKEE BRIDGE CO.

This company has reported one vessel under construction, tonnage not stated.

We have authorized a building program for the Navy that will involve the expenditure of over $600,000,000 in the next three years. This money is to be expended in American shipyards, navy yards, and private yards. We are told in one breath by those who oppose this legislation that the adoption of the Senate amendment, notwithstanding the limitations imposed, will ruin our ship-building industry. These arguments are as consistent as the arguments urged against the provisions of the bill authorizing the shipping board, through a Government-controlled corporation to operate vessels if necessary to develop our foreign trade. In one breath it is seriously charged that it will discourage private enterprise, and in the next breath the question is asked, "What will the addition of 600,000 tons of vessels, as authorized by this bill, amount to anyway?"

We need six or seven million tons to meet the requirements of our foreign trade. Yet it is seriously asserted that if the shipping board, under the power conferred under the provisions of this bill, either have constructed in American shipyards or in foreign shipyards a paltry 600,000 tons of shipping toward meeting an imperative demand for not less than 6,000,000 tons of shipping to meet the full requirements of our foreign trade, it will be a menace to our shipbuilding industry. What nonsense.

This legislation neither discourages shipbuilding or operation by private enterprise in the domestic or foreign trade. On the contrary, the purpose and intent of this legislation is to help both. This bill provides that the board may employ naval architects and other experts whose services and expert knowledge will be at the disposal of our shipbuilding industry and those who are operating ships both in the coastwise and in the foreign trade.

Our shipyards are well equipped. They are well managed. They have a full quota of skilled laborers. The material entering into the construction of ships is of American manufacture and production. There is no reason why we can not build ships in American shipyards more cheaply than they can be built anywhere else in the world. And, as I have said, we are building them now more cheaply in American shipyards than they can be built in any other country, and I believe that will be true in the future. To my mind the feature of this amendment that merits emphasis is that it gives the shipping board the power to either purchase or cause ships to be constructed in foreign shipyards and admit them to American registry, for the foreign or coastwise trade, that it places in their hands the power which I believe will be exercised judiciously to prevent unreasonable prices in American shipyards.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I can not yield, I regret; I have not got the time.

The most of our large shipyards are either under the control or owned by the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries. My information is that the Maryland Steel is owned by the Pennsylvania Steel Co. The Fore River shipyard is owned by the Bethlehem Steel, as is the Union Iron Works of the Pacific coast, and I might mention others. Hence I say, if we have any independent shipyards in this country, and we have some, it will give the Shipping Board power to compel these corporations, if they are disposed to extort larger prices for material that enter into the construction of ships, to treat the industry fairly and let our shipyards have material at reasonable cost, and if they do so I have no fear that any part of these expenditures will be made in foreign shipyards.

I have been chairman of the Merchant Marine Committee for six years, and I have been a member of that committee ever since I have been in Congress, and I have never favored the admission of foreign ships to the coastwise trade as a policy; but to take away from the board this power is simply to give it over to those who sell the material that enters into the construction of ships or those engaged in shipbuilding industry in this country—the power to extort unreasonable prices for tonnage. It simply takes the power out of the hands of the shipbuilding industry and those who control material that enters into ships under existing conditions, to combine and demand unreasonable prices for building ships, and lodges in the board the power to demand fair treatment. The legislation providing for construction of the Panama Canal provides that the President might have the power to buy material entering into the construction of that great waterway in foreign countries if he could not buy that material in our country at a reasonable cost.

Mr. Speaker, I remarked in the outset of this discussion of the Senate amendments Nos. 1, 2, and 3 to this bill that they are wholly unnecessary and might lead to confusion. I take it, however, that it was the intention to remove every possible doubt that cargo vessels that come under the legal definition of bailees for hire, and commonly known as tramps, shall be exempt from the provisions of the act.

If the Senate had taken the care to examine the brief which I caused to be prepared and incorporated in the hearings, defining the distinction between tramps, or bailees for hire, and the term "common carriers by water" as used in the bill, they would have seen that these amendments were wholly unnecessary, and the amendments Nos. 2 and 3 may prove too restrictive.

It may be worth while to incorporate the brief referred to as part of my remarks:

LEGAL STATUS OF TRAMP VESSELS.

In the consideration of legislation for the regulation of common carriers by water it becomes important to know whether tramp vessels ever possess the status of common carriers.

It may be stated as an almost general proposition that such vessels seldom or never can be considered as common carriers. Tramp vessels are almost universally chartered by a single shipper, even though in some instances that shipper may be a charter broker who has accumulated the shipments of a number of small shippers. It has become well established by a long line of decisions in the Federal courts that when a charter party gives the charterer the full capacity of a ship the owner is not a common carrier but a bailee to transport as a private carrier for hire.

The earliest case upon this point is Gracie v. Palmer (8 Wheat., 605, 632 (1823)), in which the court said:

"The carrier may hire his vehicle, or his team, or his servant, for the purposes of transportation; or he may undertake to employ them himself in the act of transporting the goods of another. It is in the latter case only that he assumes the liabilities and acquires the rights of a common carrier. So the shipowner who let his ship to hire to another, whether manned and equipped or not, enters into a contract totally distinct from that of him who engages to employ her himself in the transportation of the goods of another. In the former case he parts with the possession to another, and that other becomes the carrier; in the latter he retains the possession of the ship, although the hold may be the property of the charterer; and being subject to the liabilities, he retains the rights incident to the character of a common carrier."

While this statement of the court in this case is perhaps little more than dicta, the same principles have been applied in a number of subsequent cases in the circuit and district courts. In Lamb v. Parkman (1 Sprague, 343; 14 Fed. Cas. No. 8020 (1857)) it was definitely held that where a ship was let by charter party to the defendant who was to furnish a full cargo the owners, having no right to take goods for any other person, were in no sense common carriers, but only bailees to transport for hire.

This decision has been followed in Bell v. Pidgeon (5 Fed., 634, 638), the Dan (40 Fed., 692), the Fri (154 Fed., 333, 338), and the Royal Sceptre (187 Fed., 224, 226).

In Sumner v. Caswell (20 Fed., 249, 251) the question was discussed at some length. The court said:

"The charter appears to have contemplated carrying the goods of the freighters only. She was in no sense, therefore, a general ship, but only a ship hired for a specific voyage to carry a particular cargo for the charterers. Such a contract does not seem to be within the definition of a common carrier. In the case of The Niagara v. Cordes (21 How., 7) a common carrier is defined as 'one who undertakes for hire to transport the goods of those who may choose to employ him from place to place. He is, in general, bound to take the goods of all who offer, unless his complement for the trip is full or the goods be of such kind as to be liable to extraordinary danger or such as he is unaccustomed to convey.' None of these conditions attach to a contract of affreightment in charter parties like the present. In Lamb v. Parkman (1 Sprague, 353) it is stated by Sprague, J., that such contracts 'are not those of a common carrier, but of bailees for hire, bound to the use of ordinary care and skill.' And such is the view taken in Pars. Shipp. & Adm., volume 1, pages 245, 248. The most recent discussion of the subject is in the case of Nugent v. Smith (1 C. P. Div., 19), in which a liability like that of a common carrier was upheld by Brett, J., but was subsequently overruled in the court of appeals by Cockburn, C. J. (1 C. P. Div., 423 (1876).)"

While, as pointed out by the court, the decision in this case did not rest upon this distinction, the reasoning of the court in this case has been cited and followed in several of the other cases cited in this memorandum.

In the Wildenfels (161 Fed., 864, 866) the court said:

"But, irrespective of these considerations, we are of the opinion that the Rover was not pro hac vice a common carrier. It is true that her owner was in the lighterage business and was in the habit of taking goods for anyone who wanted lighterage done. She had, however, no regular route, did not carry between well-known termini, and, on the occasion in question, was engaged to carry, and had on board only, the jute of the libelant. She was not a general ship, but was employed for this business exclusively; no one else had a right to put a pound of freight aboard her. She became a private carrier and liable only as a bailee for hire. Her owner was under no legal obligation to carry this jute; he could have refused this and all other cargoes had he seen fit to do so, and no liability would have attached to his refusal."

And, after citing Sumner v. Caswell, Lamb v. Parkman, and the Fri, pointed out that, as held in Fish v. Chapman (2 Ga., 349, 353), the liability to an action for a refusal to carry is the safest criterion of the character of the carrier.

That the Congress and the country may have a clear idea of the conditions growing out of the war in Europe which have given inspiration and impetus to this legislation, and the many economies in shipbuilding that may be worked out by a wise and skillful administration of this law, and the enormous toll American commerce has been compelled to pay in the way of ocean freight rates by reason of our lack of ships to meet the demands of our enormous foreign trade, I think it worth while to incorporate my report on this bill as part of my remarks:

[House Report No. 659, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.]

CREATING A SHIPPING BOARD, A NAVAL AUXILIARY, A MERCHANT MARINE, AND REGULATING CARRIERS BY WATER ENGAGED IN THE FOREIGN AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 15455:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15455) to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes, having considered the same, report it to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The full text of the bill follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That when used in this act—

"The term 'common carrier by water in foreign commerce' means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property between the United States or any of its Districts, Territories, or possessions and a foreign country, including the import and export trade.

"The term 'common carrier by water in interstate commerce' means a common carrier engaged in the transportation by water of passengers or property between one State, Teritory, District, or possession of the United States and any other State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States, or between places in the same Territory, District, or possession.

"The term 'common carrier by water' means a common carrier by water in foreign commerce or a common carrier by water in interstate commerce.

"The term 'other person subject to this act' means any person not included in the term 'common carrier by water,' carrying on the business of forwarding, ferrying, towing, or furnishing transfer, lighterage, wharfage, dock warehouse, or other terminal facilities in or in connection with a common carrier by water.

"The term 'person' includes corporations, partnerships, and associations, existing under or authorized by the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, or of any foreign country.

"SEC. 2. That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States, and, in the case of a corporation, unless its president and managing directors are citizens of the United States and the corporation itself is organized under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

"The provisions of this act shall apply to receivers and trustees of all persons to whom the act applies.

"SEC. 3. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the United States shipping board, and hereinafter referred to as the board. The board shall be composed of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce, as members ex officio, and five commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; one of such commissioners to be designated by the President as chairman of the board and one as vice chairman.

"The first commissioners appointed shall continue in office for terms of two, three, four, five, and six years, respectively, from the date of their appointment, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds.

"The commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed on them by this act, and to a fair representation of the geographical divisions of the country. Not more than three of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. No commissioner shall be in the employ of or hold any official relation to any common carrier by water or other person subject to this act, or own any stocks or bonds thereof, or be pecuniarily interested therein. No commissioner shall actively engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the board shall not impair the right of the remaining members of the board to exercise all its powers. The board shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

"The board may adopt rules and regulations in regard to its procedure and the conduct of its business.

"SEC. 4. That each member of the board, except the ex officio members, shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum. The board shall appoint a secretary, at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, officers, naval architects, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be appropriated for by the Congress. The President, upon the request of the board, may authorize the detail of officers of the military and naval services of the United States for such duties as the board may deem necessary in connection with its business.

"With the exception of the secretary, a clerk to each commissioner, the attorneys, naval architects, and such special experts and examiners as the board may from time to time find necessary to employ for the conduct of its work, all employees of the board shall be a part of the classified civil service.

"The expenses of the board, including necessary expenses for transportation, incurred by the members of the board or by its employees under its orders, in making any investigation, or upon official business in any other place than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board.

"Until otherwise provided by law the board may rent suitable offices for its use.

"The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall receive and examine all accounts of expenditures of the board.

"SEC. 5. That the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to have constructed and equipped in American shipyards and navy yards or elsewhere, giving preference, other things being equal, to domestic yards, or to purchase, lease, or charter, vessels suitable, as far as the commercial requirements of the marine trade of the United States may permit, for use as naval auxiliaries or Army transports, or for other naval or military purposes.

"SEC. 6. That the President may transfer to the board such vessels belonging to the War or Navy Department as are suitable for commercial uses and not required for military or naval use in time of peace, and cause to be transferred to the board vessels owned by the Panama Railroad Co. and not required in its business.

"SEC. 7. That the board, upon terms and conditions prescribed by it and approved by the President, may charter, lease, or sell to any person, a citizen of the United States, any vessel so purchased, constructed, or transferred.

"SEC. 8. That when any vessel purchased or constructed by or transferred to the board as herein provided, and owned by the United States, becomes, in the opinion of the board, unfit for the purposes of this act, it shall be appraised and sold at public or private sale free from the conditions and restrictions of this act.

"SEC. 9. That any vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may be registered or enrolled and licensed as a vessel of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining thereto: Provided, That foreign-built vessels heretofore or hereafter admitted to American registry or enrollment and license under the act of August 18, 1914, or under this act, and vessels owned, chartered, or leased by any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder (except the Panama Railroad Co.), may not engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, except that such vessels may engage in trade with Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, whether or not en route to or from a foreign port, if the board finds such trade is not being adequately served by a regular line or lines of vessels.

"Every vessel purchased, chartered, or leased from the board shall, unless otherwise authorized by the board, be operated, only under such registry or enrollment and license. Such vessels, while employed solely as merchant vessels, shall be subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels, whether the United States be interested therein as owner, in whole or in part, or hold any mortgage, lien, or other interest therein. No such vessel, without the approval of the board, shall be transferred to a foreign registry or flag or sold, nor, except under regulations prescribed by the board, be chartered or leased.

"When the United States is at war, or during any national emergency the existence of which is declared by proclamation of the President, no vessel registered or enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States shall, without the approval of the board, be sold, leased, or chartered to any person not a citizen of the United States or transferred to a foreign registry or flag.

"Any vessel sold, chartered, leased, transferred, or operated in violation of this section shall be forfeited to the United States, and whoever violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or to imprisonment of not more than five years, or both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 10. That the President, upon giving to the person interested such reasonable notice in writing as in his judgment the circumstances permit, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily, for any naval or military purpose, of any vessel purchased, leased, or chartered from the board: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the President, an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel without notice.

"Thereafter, upon ascertainment by agreement or otherwise, the United States shall pay the person interested the fair actual value at the time of taking of the interest of such person in every vessel taken absolutely, or, if taken for a limited period, the fair charter value for such period. In case of disagreement as to the fair value it shall be determined by appraisers, one to be appointed by the board, one by the person interested, and a third by the two so appointed. The finding of a majority of such appraisers shall be final and binding upon both parties.

"SEC. 11. That the board, if in its judgment such action is necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, may form under the laws of the District of Columbia one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States. The total capital stock thereof shall not exceed $50,000,000. The board may, for and on behalf of the United States, subscribe to, purchase, and vote not less than a majority of the capital stock of any such corporation, and do all other things in regard thereto necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to carry out the purposes of this act. The board, with the approval of the President, may sell any or all of the stock of the United States in such corporation, but at no time shall it be a minority stockholder therein.

"At the expiration of five years from the conclusion of the present European war the operation of vessels on the part of any such corporation in which the United States is then a stockholder shall cease and the said corporation stand dissolved. The date of the conclusion of the war shall be declared by proclamation of the President. The vessels and other property of any such corporation shall revert to the board. The board may sell, lease, or charter such vessels as provided in section 7 and shall dispose of the property other than vessels on the best available terms and, after payment of all debts and obligations, deposit the proceeds thereof in the Treasury to its credit. All stock in such corporations owned by others than the United States at the time of dissolution shall be taken over by the board at a fair and reasonable value and paid for with funds to the credit of the board. In case of disagreement, such value shall be determined in the manner provided in section 10.

"SEC. 12. That any vessel purchased, leased, or chartered from the board may be listed by the Secretary of the Navy as a vessel of the United States Naval Auxiliary Reserve. The officers and members of the crew of any such listed vessel who volunteer for the purpose and are citizens of the United States or its insular possessions may, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, be enrolled in various ranks and ratings corresponding to those of the United States Navy, not above the rank of lieutenant commander, as members of any naval reserve force established by law.

"SEC. 13. That the board shall investigate the relative cost of building merchant vessels in the United States and in foreign maritime countries, and the relative cost, advantages, and disadvantages of operating in the foreign trade vessels under United States registry and under foreign registry. It shall examine the navigation laws of the United States and the rules and regulations thereunder, and make such recommendations to the Congress as it deems proper for the amendment, improvement, and revision of such laws, and for the development of the American merchant marine. It shall investigate the legal status of mortgage loans on vessel property, with a view to means of improving the security of such loans and of encouraging investment in American shipping.

"It shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report to the Congress, which shall include its recommendations and the results of its investigations, a summary of its transactions, and a statement of all expenditures and receipts under this act, and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States is a stockholder, and the names and compensation of all persons employed by the board.

"SEC. 14. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 5 and 11 the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the board, approved by the President, shall from time to time issue and sell or use any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury under the acts of August 5, 1909, February 4, 1910, and March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $50,000,000: Provided, That any bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section may be made payable at such time within 50 years after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury may fix, instead of 50 years after the date of issue, as prescribed in the act of August 5, 1909.

"The proceeds of such bonds and the net proceeds of all sales, charters, and leases of vessels and of sales of stock made by the board, and all other moneys received by it from any source, shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the board, and are hereby permanently appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of sections 5 and 11.

"SEC. 15. That no common carrier by water shall directly or indirectly—

"First. Pay, or allow, or enter into any combination, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, to pay or allow a deferred rebate to any shipper. The term 'deferred rebate' in this act means a return of any portion of the freight money by a carrier to any shipper as a consideration for the giving of all or any portion of his shipments to the same or any other carrier, or for any other purpose, the payment of which is deferred beyond the period for which computed and is made only if, during both the period for which computed and the period of deferment, the shipper has complied with the terms of the rebate agreement or arrangement.

"Second. Use a fighting ship either separately or in conjunction with any other carrier, through agreement or otherwise. The term 'fighting ship' in this act means a vessel used in a particular trade by a carrier or group of carriers for the purpose of excluding, preventing, or reducing competition by driving another carrier out of said trade.

"Third. Retaliate against any shipper by refusing, or threatening to refuse, space accommodations when such are available, or resort to other discriminating or unfair methods, because such shipper has patronized any other carrier or has filed a complaint charging unfair treatment, or for any other reason.

"Fourth. Make any unfair or unjustly discriminatory contract with any shipper based on the volume of freight offered, or unfairly treat or unjustly discriminate against any shipper in the matter of (a) cargo space accommodations or other facilities, due regard being had for the proper loading of the vessel and the available tonnage; (b) the loading and landing of freight in proper condition; or (c) the adjustment and settlement of claims.

"Any carrier who violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000 for each offense.

"SEC. 16. That every common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, shall file immediately with the board a true copy, or, if oral, a true and complete memorandum, of every agreement with another such carrier or other person subject to this act, or modification or cancellation thereof, to which it may be a party or conform in whole or in part, fixing or regulating transportation rates or fares; giving or receiving special rates, accommodations, or other special privileges or advantages; controlling, regulating, preventing, or destroying competition; pooling or apportioning earnings, losses, or traffic; allotting ports or restricting or otherwise regulating the number and character of sailings between ports; limiting or regulating in any way the volume or character of freight or passenger traffic to be carried; or in any manner providing for an exclusive, preferential, or cooperative working arrangement. The term 'agreement' in this section includes understandings, conferences, and other arrangements.

"The board may by order disapprove, cancel, or modify any agreement, or any modification or cancellation thereof, whether or not previously approved by it, that it finds to be unjustly discriminatory or unfair as between carriers, shippers, exporters, importers, or ports, or between exporters from the United States and their foreign competitors, or to operate to the detriment of the commerce of the United States or to be in violation of this act, and shall approve all other agreements, modifications, or cancellations.

"Agreements existing at the time of the organization of the board shall be lawful until disapproved by the board. It shall be unlawful to carry out any agreement or any portion thereof disapproved by the board.

"All agreements, modifications, or cancellations made after the organization of the board shall be lawful only when and as long as approved by the board, and before approval or after disapproval it shall be unlawful to carry out in whole or in part, directly or indirectly, any such agreement, modification, or cancellation.

"Every agreement, modification, or cancellation lawful under this section shall be excepted from the provisions of the act approved July 2, 1890, entitled 'An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies,' and amendments and acts supplementary thereto, and the provisions of sections 73 to 77, both inclusive, of the act approved August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' and amendments and acts supplementary thereto.

"Whoever violates any provision of this section shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000 for each day such violation continues, to be recovered by the United States in a civil action.

"SEC. 17. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, either alone or in conjunction with any other person, directly or indirectly—

"First. To make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, locality, or description of traffic in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, locality, or description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

"Second. To allow any person to obtain transportation for property at less than the regular rates then established and enforced on the line of such carrier, by means of false billing, false classification, false weighing, false report of weight, or by any other unjust or unfair device or means.

"Third. To induce, persuade, or otherwise influence any marine insurance company or underwriter, or agent thereof, not to give a competing carrier by water as favorable a rate of insurance on vessel or cargo having due regard to the class of vessel or cargo, as is granted to such carrier or other person subject to this act.

"SEC. 18. That no common carrier by water in foreign commerce shall demand, charge, or collect any rate, fare, or charge which is unjustly discriminatory between shippers or ports, or unjustly prejudicial to exporters of the United States as compared with their foreign competitors. Whenever the board finds that any such rate, fare, or charge is demanded, charged, or collected it may alter the same to the extent necessary to correct such unjust discrimination or prejudice and make an order that the carrier shall discontinue demanding, charging, or collecting any such unjustly discriminatory or prejudicial rate, fare, or charge.

"Every such carrier and every other person subject to this act shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable regulations and practices relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, storing, or delivering of property. Whenever the board finds that any such regulation or practice is unjust or unreasonable it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable regulation or practice.

"SEC. 19. That every common carrier by water in interstate commerce shall establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable rates, fares, charges, classifications, and tariffs, and just and reasonable regulations and practices relating thereto and to the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, and bills of lading, the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation, the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage, the facilities for transportation, and all other matters relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, transporting, storing, or delivering of property.

"Every such carrier shall file with the board and keep open to public inspection, in the form and manner and within the time prescribed by the board, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route; and if a through route has been established, the maximum rates, fares, and charges for or in connection with transportation between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by water.

"No such carrier shall demand, charge, or collect a greater compensation for such transportation than the rates, fares, and charges filed in compliance with this section, except with the approval of the board and after 10 days' public notice in the form and manner prescribed by the board, stating the increase proposed to be made; but the board for good cause shown may waive such notice.

"Whenever the board finds that any rate, fare, charge, classification, tariff, regulation, or practice demanded, charged, collected, or observed by such carrier is unjust or unreasonable, it may determine, prescribe, and order enforced a just and reasonable maximum rate, fare, or charge, or a just and reasonable classification, tariff, regulation, or practice.

"SEC. 20. That whenever a common carrier by water in interstate commerce reduces its rates on the carriage of any species of freight to or from competitive points below a fair and remunerative basis with the intent of driving out or otherwise injuring a competitive carrier by water, it shall not increase such rates unless after hearing the board finds that such proposed increase rests upon changed conditions other than the elimination of said competition.

"SEC. 21. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier by water or other person subject to this act, or any officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee of such carrier or person, or for any other person authorized by such carrier or person to receive information, knowingly to disclose to or permit to be acquired by any person other than the shipper or consignee, without the consent of such shipper or consignee, any information concerning the nature, kind, quantity, destination, consignee, or routing of any property tendered or delivered to such common carrier or other person subject to this act for transportation in interstate or foreign commerce, which information may be used to the detriment or prejudice of such shipper or consignee, or which may improperly disclose his business transactions to a competitor, or which may be used to the detriment or prejudice of any carrier, and it shall also be unlawful for any person to solicit or knowingly receive any such information which may be so used.

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the giving of such information in response to any legal process issued under the authority of any court of a State or of the United States, or to any officer or agent of the Government of the United States, or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, in the exercise of its powers, or to any officer or other duly authorized person seeking such information for the prosecution of persons charged with or suspected of crime, or to another carrier, or its duly authorized agent, for the purpose of adjusting mutual traffic accounts in the ordinary course of businesses of such carriers.

"SEC. 22. That the board may require any common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, or any officer, receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or employee thereof, to file with it any periodical or special report, or any account, record, rate, or charge, or any memorandum of any facts and transactions appertaining to the business of such carrier or other persons subject to this act. Such report, account, record, rate, charge, or memorandum shall be under oath whenever the board so requires, and shall be furnished in the form and within the time prescribed by the board. Whoever fails to file any report, account, record, rate, charge, or memorandum as required by this section shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each day of such default.

"Whoever willfully falsifies, destroys, mutilates, or alters any such report, account, record, rate, charge, or memorandum, or willfully files a false report, account, record, rate, charge, or memorandum, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject upon conviction to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or to both such fine and imprisonment.

"SEC. 23. That any person may file with the board a sworn complaint setting forth any violation of this act by a common carrier by water, or other person subject to this act, and asking reparation for the injury if any, caused thereby. The board shall furnish a copy of the complaint to such carrier or other person, who shall, within a reasonable time specified by the board satisfy the complaint or answer it in writing. If the complaint is not satisfied the board shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, investigate it in such manner and by such means and make such order as it deems proper. The board, if the complaint is filed within two years after the cause of action accrued, may direct the payment, on or before a day named, of full reparation to the complainant for the injury caused by such violation.

"The board, upon its own motion, may in like manner and, except as to orders for the payment of money, with the same powers, investigate any violation of this act.

"SEC. 24. Orders of the board relating to any violation of this act shall be made only after full hearing and upon a sworn complaint or in proceedings instituted of its own motion.

"All orders of the board other than for the payment of money made under this act shall continue in force for such time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed therein by the board, unless suspended, modified, or set aside by the board or any court of competent jurisdiction.

"SEC. 25. That the board shall enter of record a written report of every investigation made under this act in which a hearing has been held, stating its conclusions, decision, and order, and, if reparation is awarded, the findings of fact on which the award is made, and shall furnish a copy of such report to all parties to the investigation.

"The board may publish such reports in the form best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall, without further proof or authentication, be competent evidence of such reports in all courts of the United States and of the States, Territories, Districts, and possessions thereof.

"SEC. 26. That the board may reverse, suspend, or modify, upon such notice and in such manner as it deems proper, any order made by it. Upon application of any party to a decision or order it may grant a rehearing of the same or any matter determined therein, but no such application for or allowance of a rehearing shall, except by special order of the board, operate as a stay of such order.

"SEC. 27. That for the purpose of investigating alleged violations of this act, the board may by subpœna compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, documents, and other evidence from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. Subpœnas may be signed by any commissioner, and oaths or affirmations may be administered, witnesses examined, and evidence received by any commissioner or examiner, or, under the direction of the board, by any person authorized under the laws of the United States or of any State, Territory, District, or possession thereof to administer oaths. Persons so acting under the direction of the board and witnesses shall, unless employees of the board, be entitled to the same fees and mileage as in the courts of the United States. Obedience to any such subpœna shall, on application by the board, be enforced as are orders of the board other than for the payment of money.

"SEC. 28. That no person shall be excused, on the ground that it may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, from attending and testifying, or producing books, papers, documents, and other evidence, in obedience to the subpœna of the board or of any court in any proceeding based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of this act; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpœna and under oath, he may so testify or produce evidence, except that no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

"SEC. 29. That in case of violation of any order of the board, other than an order for the payment of money, the board, or any party injured by such violation, or the Attorney General, may apply to a district court having jurisdiction of the parties; and if, after hearing, the court determines that the order was regularly made and duly issued, it shall enforce obedience thereto by a writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise.

"SEC. 30. That in case of violation of any order of the board for the payment of money the person to whom such award was made may file in the district court for the district in which such person resides, or in which is located any office of the carrier or other person to whom the order was directed, or in which is located any point of call on a regular route operated by the carrier, or in any court of general jurisdiction, of a State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, a petition or suit setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages and the order of the board in the premises.

"In the district court the findings and order of the board shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and the petitioner shall not be liable for costs, nor shall he be liable for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal. If a petitioner in a district court finally prevails, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as part of the costs of the suit.

"All parties in whose favor the board has made an award of reparation by a single order may be joined as plaintiffs, and all other parties to such order may be joined as defendants, in a single suit in any district in which any one such plaintiff could maintain a suit against any one such defendant. Service of process against any such defendant not found in that district may be made in any district in which is located any office of, or point of call on a regular route operated by, such defendant. Judgment may be entered in favor of any plaintiff against the defendant liable to that plaintiff.

"No petition or suit for the enforcement of an order for the payment of money shall be maintained in a district or State court unless filed within one year from the date of the order.

"SEC. 31. That the venue and procedure in the courts of the United States in suits brought to enforce, suspend, or set aside, in whole or in part, any order of the board shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be the same as in similar suits in regard to orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but such suits may also be maintained in any district court having jurisidiction of the parties.

"SEC. 32. That whoever violates any provision of this act, except where a different penalty is provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by fine of not to exceed $5,000.

"SEC. 33. That this act shall not be construed to affect the power or jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor to confer upon the board concurrent power or jurisdiction over any matter within the power or jurisdiction of such commission; nor shall this act be construed to apply to intrastate commerce.

"SEC. 34. That if any provision of this act, or the application of such provision to certain circumstances, is held unconstitutional, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision of circumstances other than those as to which it is held unconstitutional, shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 35. That for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the board, including the payment of salaries herein authorized."

In February, 1914, Sixty-third Congress, second session, the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries made a report to the House of Representatives on steamship agreements and affiliations in the American foreign and domestic trade.

The investigation of such combinations was begun by the committee under House resolutions 425 and 587 in the Sixty-second Congress and continued in the Sixty-third Congress under House resolution 205. The resolution (H. Res. 587) directed the committee "to report to the House all facts disclosed by said investigation, and what legislation, if any, it deems advisable in relation thereto." In accordance with the directions of the resolution relating to legislation, the committee, by unanimous action, submitted recommendations which have been followed in large part in framing the sections of the bill 15 to 21, inclusive.

The recommendations referred to are as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS RELATING TO WATER CARRIERS ENGAGED IN THE FOREIGN TRADE.

"The facts contained in the foregoing report show that it is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conference arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates; (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry; (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic; or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines. Eighty such agreements or understandings, involving practically all the regular steamship lines operating on nearly every American foreign-trade route, are described in the foregoing report. (For a full classification of these agreements, see pp. 281 to 295 of the report.) The report also presents the economic advantages and disadvantages of steamship agreements and conference arrangements as presented to the committee by steamship line representatives and the exporting and importing interests of the United States. (For a full classification of the advantages and disadvantages, see pp. 295 to 307 of the foregoing report.)

"In formulating its recommendations it became apparent to the committee, in view of all the facts presented, that only two courses of action were open for adoption. Either the agreements and understandings, now so universally used, may be prohibited with a view to attempting the restoration of unrestricted competition, or the same may be recognized along lines which would eliminate existing disadvantages and abuses. It is claimed that the adoption of the first course—the prohibition of cooperative arrangements between practically all the lines in nearly all the divisions of our foreign trade—would not only involve a wholesale disturbance of existing conditions in the shipping business but would deprive American exporters and importers of the advantages claimed as resulting from agreements and conferences if honestly and fairly conducted, such as greater regularity and frequency of service, stability and uniformity of rates, economy in the cost of service, better distribution of sailings, maintenance of American and European rates to foreign markets on a parity and equal treatment of shippers through the elimination of secret arrangements and underhanded methods of discrimination. (A classification of the advantages claimed as resulting from the aforementioned factors is presented on pp. 295 to 303 of the foregoing report.)

"These advantages, the committee believes, can be secured only by permitting the several lines in any given trade to cooperate through some form of rate and pooling arrangement under Government supervision and control. It is the view of the committee that open competition can not be assured for any length of time by ordering existing agreements terminated. The entire history of steamship agreements shows that in ocean commerce there is no happy medium between war and peace when several lines engage in the same trade. Most of the numerous agreements and conference arrangements discussed in the foregoing report were the outcome of rate wars and represent a truce between the contending lines. To terminate existing agreements would necessarily bring about one of two results; the lines would either engage in rate wars which would mean the elimination of the weak and the survival of the strong, or, to avoid a costly struggle, they would consolidate through common ownership. Neither result can be prevented by legislation, and either would mean a monopoly fully as effective, and it is believed more so, than can exist by virtue of an agreement. Moreover, steamship agreements and conferences are not confined to the lines engaging in the foreign trade of the United States. They are as universally used in the foreign trade of other countries as in our own. The merchants of these countries now enjoy the foregoing advantages of cooperative arrangements, and to restore open and cutthroat competition among the lines serving the United States would place American exporters at a disadvantage in many markets as compared with their foreign competitors.

"Steamship-line representatives, as well as the patrons of the lines, were almost a unit in emphasizing to the committee the importance and necessity of the aforementioned advantages of agreements and conferences, and in asserting that these advantages can only be effected by permitting the several lines in a given trade to cooperate in the regulation of their rates and the expeditious handling of their business. Very few of the many exporters and importers who communicated with the committee were opposed to agreements and conferences in themselves, provided they are fairly and honestly conducted. Many, however, objected to the secrecy with which agreements and conferences are now conducted, and stated that, while the advantages must be admitted, they have no assurance and no means of knowing whether the conditions claimed for agreements and conferences are always fulfilled. A considerable number of complaints were also filed with the committee objecting to excessive rates, discrimination between shippers in rates and cargo space, indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition, arbitrariness in the settlement of just claims, failure to give due notice to shippers when rates were to be increased, refusal to properly adjust rates as between various classes of commodities, and the unfairness of certain methods—such as fighting ships, deferred rebates, and threats to refuse shipping accommodations—used by some conference lines to meet the competition of nonconference lines. Unfortunately, the truth of many of these complaints could not be ascertained because of the confidential nature of the information furnished. As pointed out in the report (p. 306), it seemed to be the general impression among shippers who filed complaints with the committee that the conference lines 'so completely dominate the shippers with whom they deal that these shippers can not afford, for fear of retaliation, to place themselves in a position of active antagonism to the lines by openly giving particulars of their grievances.'

"While admitting their many advantages, the committee is not disposed to recognize steamship agreements and conferences, unless the same are brought under some form of effective Government supervision. To permit such agreements without Government supervision would mean giving the parties thereto unrestricted right of action. Abuses exist, and the numerous complaints received by the committee show that they must be recognized. In nearly all the trade routes to and from the United States the conference lines have virtually a monopoly of the line service.

"'All monopolies,' as pointed out in the foregoing report (p. 304), 'are liable to abuse, and in our foreign carrying trade the monopoly obtained by the conference lines has not been subjected to any legal control. While carriers by land are supervised and must conform to statutory requirements in the matter of rates and treatment of shippers, steamship companies, through private arrangements, have secured for themselves monopolistic powers as effective in many instances as though they were statutory. Even granting the advantages claimed for steamship conferences and agreements, all may be withdrawn in the absence of supervisory control without the shippers having any redress or protection. The lines are under no legal obligation to continue these advantages. They exercise their powers as private combinations and are apt to abuse the same unless brought under effective Government control.'

"The committee believes that the disadvantages and abuses connected with steamship agreements and conferences as now conducted are inherent, and can only be eliminated by effective Government control; and it is such control that the committee recommends as the means of preserving to American exporters and importers the advantages enumerated, and of preventing the abuses complained of.

'The consensus of opinion (see pp. 307 to 308 of the report)," as expressed in the testimony of witnesses and in the numerous communications received by the committee from shippers, "is overwhelmingly in favor of some form of Government regulation of steamship carriers engaged in this country's foreign trade. Nearly all the steamship line representatives who appeared before the committee expressed themselves as not opposed to Government supervision which is reasonable and which is limited to the requirements of full publicity and approval of all agreements or arrangements which steamship lines may have entered into with other steamship lines, with shippers, or with other carriers and transportation agencies. On the other hand, the shippers who appeared as witnesses, or otherwise submitted recommendations for proposed legislation, were in the great majority of instances favorable to a comprehensive system of Government supervision, sufficiently broad to embrace the regulation of rates without actually fixing them, the approval of contracts, agreements, and arrangements, and the general supervision of all conditions of water transportation which vitally affect the interests of shippers. While few of the shippers who communicated with the committee by letter (and the same may be said of witnesses) attempted to specify the details of their recommendations, they are almost a unit in stating that they are convinced of the desirability of having the Interstate Commerce Commission, or a similar commission, exercise a general supervisory power over foreign water carriers and enforce among the conference lines at all times the various contentions which they have claimed for themselves during the hearings before the committee. It is noteworthy that only five of the many communications received by the committee, which were unfavorable to steamship agreements and conferences as now conducted, display an attitude of hostility toward Government regulation. In fact, many of the communications received from shippers make it clear that the writers regard the contentions of the conference line representatives as advantageous to shipper and shipowner if they are honestly and fairly carried out, but state that their experience has been to the effect that once the combination of lines is established it is apt to be used in an arbitrary and unfair way by favoring some large corporation or friend to the detriment of other shippers. Such discriminations and arbitrary treatment, it is believed, can only be eliminated by the establishment of some legally constituted authority which is empowered to hear complaints and to order the discontinuance of abuses."

"Relative to such supervisory control by the Government of steamship carriers in the foreign trade of the United States, the committee offers the following recommendations:

"1. That navigation companies, firms, or lines engaged in the foreign trade of the United States be brought under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission as regards the regulation of rates, the approval of contracts entered into with other water carriers, with shippers, or with American railroads and other transportation agencies, and such other conditions of water transportation as affect the interest of the shippers. The committee has had under consideration the recommendation of a separate commission for this purpose, but believes that, in view of the close relations existing between rail and water transportation, it would be best to intrust the supervisory control to the Interstate Commerce Commission. If found necessary, in view of the added duties involved in the extension of the Interstate Commerce Commission's jurisdiction to water transportation in accordance with the recommendations to follow, the committee further recommends that the membership of the commission be enlarged.

"2. That all carriers engaged in the foreign trade of the United States, parties to any agreements, understandings, or conference arrangements hereinafter referred to, be required to file for approval with the Interstate Commerce Commission a copy of all written agreements (or a complete memorandum if the understanding or agreement is oral) entered into (1) with any other steamship companies, firms, or lines engaged directly or indirectly in the American trade, or (2) with American shippers, railroads, or other transportation agencies. All modifications and cancellations of such agreements or understandings as may be made from time to time should also be promptly filed. The commission should be empowered to order canceled any such agreements, or any parts thereof, that it may find to be discriminating or unfair in character, or detrimental to the commercial interests of the United States.

"3. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to investigate fully complaints charging the unreasonable or unfairness of rates, or to institute proceedings on its own initiative, and to order such rates changed if convinced that the rate under consideration is unreasonably high, or discriminating in character as between shippers or ports, or between exporters of the United States and their foreign competitors; and to order restitution to shippers of all sums collected in excess of reasonable rates. This recommendation is also intended to extend to the supervision of freight classifications used by the lines, and the investigation of complaints charging refusal on the part of any carrier to properly adjust the rates between classes of commodities.

"The committee realizes that the steamship business differs essentially from that of the railroads (for those differences see pp. 309 to 311 of the report), and that it might prove injurious to both shipowners and American exporters to require the lines to file their rates and not be permitted to lower the same until after a stipulated period of notice to change rates had been given. On the other hand, the committee feels that in the absence of Government control steamship combinations may in many instances have it within their power to arbitrarily raise rates to an unreasonable degree both as regards the general level and in the case of particular commodities; or, if they so desire, to fail in maintaining rates from the United States to foreign markets on a parity with those from other countries. It is not the purpose of this recommendation to prevent steamship lines from promptly lowering their rates to meet competitive conditions and thus to favor American exporters, who, in competing with foreign markets, often find it necessary in order to close their contracts to have quoted an immediate and favorable rate; but the purpose of the law should be to protect the shipper against any unreasonably high rate which the combination lines may have within their power, by virtue of their agreements and conference arrangements, arbitrarily to impose in the absence of Government supervision and control.

"4. That rebating of freight rates to shippers be made illegal, and that, with due regard to the proper loading of the vessel and the tonnage available, discrimination between shippers or ports in the matter of rates and space accommodations be prohibited. In this connection it is the belief of the committee that water carriers should be required to charge equal rates to all shippers irrespective of the volume of freight offered for shipment.

"5. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to investigate fully all complaints (or to undertake such investigation on its own initiative) charging (1) failure on the part of any carrier to give reasonable notice of increase in rates, (2) unfair treatment of shippers in the matter of cargo space and other facilities, (3) the existence of discriminating or unfair contracts with certain shippers, and (4) unfairness in the settlement of claims and indifference to the landing of freight in proper condition. In this connection the commission should be empowered to order the discontinuance of all unfair or discriminating practices which it may find to exist and to adopt whatever measures it may deem necessary to protect the complainant against retaliation.

"6. That the use of 'fighting ships' and deferred rebates be prohibited in both the export and import trade of the United States. Moreover, all carriers should be prohibited from retaliating against any shipper by refusing space accommodations when such are available or by resorting to other unfair methods of discrimination, because such shipper has patronized an independent line or has filed a complaint charging unfair treatment or for any other reason.

"7. That adequate penalties be provided to correct and prevent the abuses hereinabove set forth.

RECOMMENDATIONS RELATING TO WATER CARRIERS ENGAGED IN THE DOMESTIC TRADE.

"Unlike the practice of water carriers in the foreign trade of the United States, agreements to divide the territory or charge certain rates in the domestic trade are few. Competition in rates between domestic water lines, however, has been quite as effectively eliminated as in the foreign trade, and this has been accomplished by the several lines through one or more of the numerous methods discussed in Part II of the foregoing report and summarized on pages 409 to 412. (Also see pp. 403 to 412, giving a 'summary of the extent and methods of control of competition between water carriers in the domestic trade.')

"The act of August 24, 1912, providing for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, contains provisions extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over interstate transportation which involves the carriage of property by rail and water, in the following particulars, viz. (1) to establish physical connection, where this is reasonably practicable and justifiable, between the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing either or both of the carriers to construct the connecting tracks; (2) 'to establish through routes and maximum joint rates over such rail and water lines, and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced'; and (3) 'to establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought, or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates will apply.' Section 11 of the act also provides for the divorcing of common carriers by water from the railroads under certain conditions. These legislative requirements go far toward eliminating some of the undesirable practices which were found by the committee to exist in the domestic commerce of the United States. The committee, however, believes, in view of the facts presented in Part II of the report, that additional legislation is required, and wishes to offer the following recommendations:

"1. That the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission be extended to the interstate port-to-port traffic of domestic water carriers, with full power to require all such carriers to file their port-to-port rates and to submit reports of their financial and business operations. As regards interstate port-to-port traffic the commission should be given full power to regulate rates and to determine maximum charges.

"2. That water carriers be required to file for approval with the Interstate Commerce Commission all agreements or arrangements affecting interstate transportation, whether written or oral, and all modifications or cancellations thereof, with other water carriers, with railroads or other transportation agencies, or with shippers.

"3. That the carriers be prohibited from granting rebates of any kind to shippers and from discriminating between shippers in rates, in the giving of space accommodations and other facilities, and in the making of unfair contracts based on the volume of freight offered. Water carriers should also be prohibited from using fighting ships, or deferred rebates, or from threatening or resorting to retaliatory or other unfair measures against shippers or competitors. The Interstate Commerce Commission should be empowered to adopt whatever measures it may consider necessary to protect shippers or competitors against such retaliatory methods. Water carriers, if cutting rates with a view to driving out a competitor, should be denied the privilege of restoring rates; and jurisdiction should be conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine whether rates were cut with the object of crushing such competitor.

"4. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to investigate fully all complaints charging unfairness in the settlement of claims, and indifference to the loading and landing of freight in proper condition; and to adopt all necessary rules and regulations for the adjustment and settlement of claims.

"5. That as regards all matters relating to interstate transportation, all traffic associations or conferences, whether pertaining to through rail-and-water transportation or to port-to-port traffic only, be brought under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The committee recommends that the conditions under which an outside water carrier is admitted to such associations or conferences should be approved by the commission, and that an outside line should not be denied membership for unfair reasons or simply because the unanimous consent of existing members of the association or conference to the admission of said line can not be obtained.

"6. That the railroads be prohibited from making the through rail-and-water route unprofitable as compared with the all-rail route by charging more for the same service on water-borne commodities than they charge for the proportionate share of the all-rail haul.

"7. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to compel railroads to allow competitive water carriers to apply effective differentials. The commission should also have full supervisory power over divisions between railroads and water carriers as regards through rail-and-water rates. The committee recommends that rate divisions on any trade route should be opened equally to all water carriers that comply with such conditions of quality and regularity of service as the commission may determine to be reasonable.

"8. That the railroads and water carriers be required to issue through bills of lading to all interstate water carriers that meet such conditions of quality and regularity of service as the Interstate Commerce Commission may consider reasonable.

"9. That railroads be required to account separately to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the income and expenditures of interstate water lines owned or controlled by them.

"10. That railroads be required to make their terminal facilities available to water carriers on equal terms and under such reasonable conditions as the Interstate Commerce Commission may prescribe. The committee also believes that the Federal Government should pursue a policy of not expending money in the interests of any port for harbor or channel improvements unless that port has efficient dock facilities available to all water carriers.

"11. That there should be legislation providing for equal treatment to all shippers and water carriers by transfer and lighterage concerns when forming a link in interstate or foreign commerce.

"12. That all interstate traffic on canals be placed under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that the railroads be prohibited in the future from acquiring, either directly or indirectly, ownership and control of or interest in canals, or water lines, forwarding companies, and other navigation facilities on such canals, when the same are used in interstate transportation."

It will be noted that the committee recommended that the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission be extended to common carriers by water, or that some other tribunal should be created and vested with jurisdiction over common carriers by water.

The consensus of public opinion seems to favor the creation of a shipping board vested with such powers, rather than to add to the duties and responsibilities of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is now vested with some of the powers covered by the recommendations of the committee, and to avoid any possible conflict of jurisdiction section 32 of the bill expressly provides: "That this act shall not be construed to affect the power or jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor to confer upon the board concurrent power or jurisdiction over any matter within the power of jurisdiction of such commission; nor shall this act be construed to apply to intrastate commerce."

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.

SECTIONS 22 TO 34, INCLUSIVE.

While the part of the bill relating to the regulation of carriers by water differs necessarily and materially from the corresponding provisions of the interstate-commerce act, the difference is not so radical that the administration and enforcement provisions of the latter act and the nearly 30 years' experience of the Interstate Commerce Commission can not be adapted with slight modifications to the purposes of this bill.

Section 22, relating to the requiring of information, confers upon the board only a part of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission under section 20 of the interstate-commerce act, by which the commission is empowered to prescribe a uniform system of accounts as well as the form of all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the act, and its examiners given access to such accounts for the purpose of inspection and examination. While it is well within the power of Congress to impose similar requirements upon carriers by water in interstate commerce, the committee deems it neither advisable or necessary, at least at this time, to make the provisions of this bill any more burdensome in this respect upon carriers by water in interstate commerce than those imposed upon similar carriers operating under foreign flags and engaged in the foreign commerce of the United States.

Sections 23 to 31, inclusive, modeled very closely after the interstate-commerce act, in brief and concise manner confer upon the board power to make orders necessary for the enforcement of the act, and provide the means for the enforcement of such orders.

Under section 23 any person may file with the board a sworn complaint setting forth any violation of the act. The board, after due notice to the person complained of, shall investigate the matter and make such order as may be proper, including an award of reparation for any injury resulting from the violation. Similar powers are conferred upon the board to investigate and make orders upon its own initiative, except that awards of reparation may be made only upon complaint. Provision is also made in section 24 that orders relating to a violation may be made only after a full hearing. While this secures to a person alleged to have violated the act a full opportunity to be heard in his own defense, it at the same time leaves free from unnecessary restrictions the action of the board in other matters.

The provisions of section 24 relating to the time during which orders of the board shall continue in effect are the same as those of the interstate-commerce act, but the provision of the latter act that orders shall not take effect for 30 days has been omitted, as the committee feels that this matter should properly be left to the discretion of the board

The provisions of section 27 relating to the power of the board to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary and other evidence are also substantially similar to those of the interstate-commerce act, except that the board may exercise such power only "for the purpose of investigating alleged violations of this act," instead of "for the purposes of this act," as in the interstate-commerce act Under this broad phrase in the latter act, as construed by the Supreme Court (Harriman v. United States, 211 U. S., 407 [1908]), the power of the board is limited to investigations of violations. The provision that testimony may be taken under the direction of the board by any person authorized to administer oaths has been substituted for the lengthy but little used provisions of the interstate-commerce act relating to depositions. Section 28 includes the essential provisions of the compulsory-testimony act of February 11, 1893, and the immunity-of-witnesses act of June 30, 1906.

In sections 29 and 30, providing the means for the enforcement of orders of the board, the provisions as to jurisdiction of the district courts have been slightly changed because of the difference between rail and water traffic.

The somewhat lengthy provisions of the district court jurisdiction act of October 22, 1913, as to the venue and procedure in suits to enforce suspend, or set aside orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission are extended by section 31 to apply to orders of the board. In view of the ambiguous provision of that act as to venue, the section provides that such suits may also be maintained in any district court having jurisdiction of the parties.

Section 32 is a general penalty provision, corresponding to section 10 of the interstate-commerce act, and making any violation, except where a different penalty is specifically provided, a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $5,000.

Section 33 provides that this act shall not affect the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission nor confer upon the board concurrent jurisdiction over any matter within the jurisdiction of the commission. Its purpose is to obviate a conflict of jurisdiction if in some unforeseen manner any substantive provision of this bill inadvertently overlaps a corresponding provision of the interstate-commerce act. The last clause of this section—that the act shall not apply to intrastate commerce—corresponds to the similar provision of section 1 of the interstate-commerce act, both of which are rendered advisable in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the first Employers' Liability cases (207 U. S., 463 (1908)).

Section 34 is merely a legislative declaration of the separableness of each provision of the act, so that in the very unlikely event of any provision being unconstitutional the remainder of the act would not be endangered thereby.

The active duties of the board will devolve on the commissioners appointed by the President; hence the committee thought it wise to increase the number from three, as proposed in the original bill, to five, as provided in this bill. The Secretaries of the Navy and Commerce are heads of great departments of the Government, and they will have little time to give to the duties of the board. In view of the fact that the vessels to be constructed or purchased by the board are to become naval auxiliaries and may be listed by the Secretary of the Navy as vessels of the United States Naval Auxiliary Reserve, and the officers and crews of such vessels may, under regulations prescribed by him, enlist as members of any Naval Reserve force established by law, it was thought that he should be made a member of the board. The reasons for making the Secretary of Commerce a member of the board are even more cogent, as the Bureaus of Navigation, Steamboat-Inspection Service, Lighthouses, and Coast and Geodetic Survey are under the jurisdiction of that department.

The committee fully recognizes that many of the duties of the board are quasi judicial in character, like those of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the board should be removed, as far as possible, from partisan political influence; hence the bill provides that not more than three of the five commissioners shall belong to the same political party.

We have faith to believe that the President in naming the commissioners will have greater regard for their fitness to discharge the very grave and responsible duties that will devolve upon them than for their party affiliations.

We believe this board will become permanent and that its functions will in time become as important in the development and supervision of our mercantile marine as those of the British board of trade to the mercantile marine of Great Britain.

SHIPBUILDING.

It is generally conceded that at this time merchant vessels can be built in American shipyards at less cost than in foreign shipyards. The board has the power to have built or purchase vessels built in American shipyards or elsewhere, giving preference to American shipyards. Unless conditions change materially in Europe at the close of the war, all the vessels for the construction or purchase of which provision is made in the bill will be built in American shipyards. It is the earnest desire that all such vessels may be built in American shipyards, and we have good reason to believe that by utilizing improved methods in shipbuilding, and by standardizing the various types of vessels, not only the cost of construction may be very materially reduced, but the cost of operation as well.

In this connection the committee invites attention to the statements of Capt. Ellsworth P. Bertholf, captain commandant of the Coast Guard; Capt. C. A. McAllister, of the Coast Guard; and Mr. E. Platt Stratton, supervisor of the American Bureau of Shipping, in a letter to Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, and referred to by the Secretary at the hearings, which is printed in the hearings, and on account of its importance is here reproduced:

"AMERICAN BUREAU OF SHIPPING,
"New York, January 22, 1916.

"Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
"Secretary Department of Commerce,
"Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you are not likely to be in this city prior to February 23, and knowing your sincere desire to facilitate the development of American commerce, I take the liberty of submitting the following for your kind consideration:

* * * * * * *

"The present type of construction has brought about a ship of a comparatively square bilge supported internally by margin plates of the double bottom, which in turn accommodates any accumulation of bilge water and concentrates its flow to whatever type the pumping system may be adapted.

"This class of construction requires the cutting of all frames at the bilge and uniting them with the floors by means of gusset plates, thus doing away with the expensive and cumbersome method of bending frames in one piece from keel to gunwale. All of the members, therefore, of the modern ship anticipates comparatively straight pieces, with the exception of the stem, cant frames, and stern frame.

"It is therefore now possible to readily ship on flat cars or by water transportation all the members ready for assembling of any vessel of the type herein referred to.

"The best method of construction now anticipates the punching of all rivet holes from one-sixteenth inch to one-eighth inch scant preparatory to the members being assembled when the punch holes of scant diameter are reamed with pneumatic tools after the plates and members are assembled and service bolted, all riveting being done with pneumatic holders-on and pneumatic riveters, preceding which all holes are reamed by pneumatic tools and are therefore made fair in position. Two men with one of these reamers will ream and make fair to standard sizes from 1,400 to 1,600 holes a day."

Secretary REDFIELD. The description follows closely the construction of steel-frame buildings.

"With these conditions before us, it seems to me that the time has arrived when great steel companies should undertake the preparation and fabrication of cargo ships complete, in batches of at least 10 of a kind, to be reassembled and riveted up on our river, lake, or seacoast in the same way and manner in which such companies are now supplying the members for elevated railroads and bridge construction, the plates for such vessels first to be approved by the classification society representing the underwriting interests, which in turn would insure the lowest rates of insurance on the vessel when constructed under superintendence and survey.

"Several shipyards in existence on the line of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers could thus be utilized to great advantage in assembling vessels of the type referred to, which would insure the utilization of a type of labor of the greatest value at seasons when not properly employed in agriculture.

"I incline to the belief that the right type of man might take up this matter with some of the subordinate companies of the United States Steel Co. and carry it through to a very successful issue; and the time and circumstances seem to be opportune for such an undertaking.

"The model of such vessels should first be tested in the governmental tank at Washington, which would give lines of least resistance in specific displacement.

"Steam, reciprocating, turbine, or internal-combustion engines could be contracted for on specific lines suitable to the vessels during the progress of their construction, and in this way standard units of commerce of assured excellence could be produced which would offer the greatest facility to owners, merchants, or shippers on assured lines of efficiency.

"Should you kindly consider this brief outline worthy of consideration, it will furnish me great pleasure to facilitate any ideas which you may have upon the subject in the interest of all concerned.

"Very truly, yours,

"E. PLATT STRATTON."

Secretary REDFIELD. The suggestion was of such original character that I submitted it at once to the naval constructor, Bureau of Lighthouses, and he replied under date of January 29, "I beg to state that I have considered the proposition as outlined therein, and in my opinion it is entirely feasible, provided that a suitable type of design of vessel to meet the commercial demand be settled upon," and the report proceeds in approval.

I then returned the matter to the American Bureau of Shipping and asked them if they would be kind enough to reconsider it with a great deal of care and advise me finally what I could with some confidence lay before this committee as a statement showing the possibilities in it as a method of constructing vessels. You are all aware, gentlemen, that the structural-steel industry is an American industry. The buildings of Europe are not built of structural steel. They do not build steel-frame buildings, as we build them, in any other country. I say never, meaning very rarely, if ever. It is an American industry, which we have carried to a greater height of perfection than any other country, and if it is possible, as these practical gentlemen say, to utilize this method of constructing hulls, there is no country in the world prepared to compete with us in that way.

In response to my inquiry I received this letter, dated February 8, of which I will read a brief portion:

"If any one of the great steel companies of this country could be induced to start out on the plan herein enunciated for cargo ships, I think that within two years we could be launching vessels from one to five thousand tons cargo capacity in many sections of the country. There are many wooden-ship yards on our coast, bays, and tributaries where the assembling of ships could be very advantageously conducted with far less difficulty and much more expedition than our ocean-going fleet of a half century ago was hewn out and assembled from material existent within our forests."

And then follows his formal statement in detail of the method of constructing the vessels.

[By E. Platt Stratton, supervisor of the American Bureau of Shipping.]

"Signs multiply of a disposition in the United States so to standardize the construction of cargo types of steamships as greatly to reduce their cost This tendency is to be encouraged in every way possible, since its successful development will go a long way toward making the United States entirely independent of other countries in the construction of the ships in its foreign carrying, as the country always has been independent of foreign countries in the construction of ships for its domestic carrying.

"In the construction of ships for the carriage of passengers and freight and in the construction of the higher class swift leviathans that carry passengers, mails, and express standardization is not practicable, but in the construction of the higher types of ships the United States is not so far behind shipyards of other countries in the matter of cost as it is in the construction of the purely cargo type of ship.

"SOME CONSTRUCTION DETAILS.

"Cargo steamships of from 1,000 to 10,000 dead-weight capacity on a block coefficient of from 75 to 80 per cent of the cube of their length, breadth, and depth, and a standard rate of speed not to exceed 12 knots, is the trend and the type most useful for general trade. Such vessels are now built with double bottoms for water ballast, which have become more and more of a necessity to facilitate the handling of the ships when light or in motion without cargo. Double bottoms also offer great facility for the storage and use of any of the varieties of liquid fuel, which frequently are found to be more advantageous, if not more profitable, than coal, particularly when the cost of stowing it in the ship's bunkers and the cost of firing it with man power is considered.

"Vessels of this type of construction have brought about an arrangement to protect cargoes from bilge water, through flat floors, full or square bilges supported internally by the margin plates of the double bottoms, which in turn form gutters or bilges. This method of construction necessitates the breaking of the continuity of all ships' floors and frames at the turn of the bilge, properly flanged 'gusset plates' supplying the necessary strength at the points where they are reunited. This does away completely with the heretofore expensive and somewhat cumbersome method of rolling frames in great lengths and then reheating and bending them preparatory to their being assembled in position to receive the plating of the ship.

"The methods of metal-ship construction heretofore in use has involved the making of templates for each plate, angle, and shape used in the vessel's construction and a vast amount of work in the shipyard involving fitting, bending, punching, fairing, and riveting. In vessels of large dimensions many of these separate parts are of such weight and size as to require machinery and gangs of workmen to handle them in the different processes of assembling, fitting, and riveting them when in their proper positions in the ships.

"THE GREAT STEEL PLANTS SHOULD TAKE HOLD.

"In this connection, think what would be the cost, detention, and protracted delay if our elevated railroad structures, bridges, fireproof hotels, storehouses, and railroad depots were built after such a manner. The only condition that seems to justify such a method in ship construction is the necessity of constructing the vessel where and when as an assembled mass it may be launched where it will receive its equipment and fittings afloat, all of which go to make the complete and perfect cargo ship, or, as President Wilson has characterized it, 'a national shuttle of industry.' The opportunity is now open for some of our great steel plants to prepare models of a series of cargo steamships of standard designs and varying tonnage, submitting the models to tank experiments in advance, say, under the supervision of the Navy Department, in order to secure vessels with lines of least resistance; also having tables of scantlings approved by the national inspection service and the American underwriters, thus assuring the lowest rates of marine insurance on the vessels when completed. At the mills all parts, whether plates, angles, or shapes, would be of standard dimensions, sheared and punched to standard templates, all holes being punched and left from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of an inch scant to allow for reaming to standard gauge. When the parts shall have been assembled for service, bolting and riveting at the point or place of final fabrication, the reaming of holes, riveting, chipping, and calking, all then being done by pneumatic tools.

"Such methods would insure the prompt rehabilitation of many of the Nation's original shipbuilding plants for this assembling and fabrication of hundreds of ships of various sizes, which could not by any other method be dealt with. It can therefore be readily understood that the work at the coast or in the shipyard would only be one of assembling and riveting up the parts furnished by the steel mills to the railroads for delivery at the point of fabrication.

"DUPLICATION OF PARTS.

"The motive power for such standardized vessels for fixed rates of speed can be reliably furnished as specialties of manufacture in duplication in the same manner in which standard types of pumps, turbines, and internal-combustion engines are now manufactured and supplied by such establishments as the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Co., William Cramp & Sons, W. & A. Fletcher Co., and the Babcock & Wilcox Co., as well as other boiler companies that now supply large installations of boiler equipment.

"Such methods of ship construction and equipment anticipate the utilization of many of our original wooden shipyards, since the chief requirements will be facilities for assembling the various parts of the ship and launching the hull when fully fabricated, for there are still many valuable shipbuilding locations along the water front of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and the coast, bays, and tributaries, at points where labor is to be found in abundance and of a character that can be utilized to the greatest advantage.

"STEEL MILLS AS INITIAL SHIPBUILDING PLANTS.

"Our country's great steel works now possess the facilities in capacity, if not in detail, for furnishing the finest shipbuilding material at as low prices as that of any other country.

"The perfection of the various details in ship construction herein referred to in outline will doubtless quickly bring the United States to the front as the first shipbuilding nation of the earth in the production of standard cargo carriers unequalled by any other nation possessed of like commercial facilities, to which our unlimited quantities of cheap materials will greatly contribute. With cargo carriers thus under such good headway our shipyards will gradually become expert in the construction of all of the types of merchant ships that go to make up a general marine. The opportunity and all of the accessories necessary for success are now ours."

Secretary REDFIELD. It was not with any idea, Mr. Chairman, of this nature that we did what was done in the way of developing this bill. This has all come up since the matter was thought of, and is simply a very interesting illustration of what has been possible in other lines of work, and what new types of vessels may be possible hereafter.

(The memoranda submitted by Capts. Bertholf and McAllister are as follows:)

SHIPPING BILL—COSTS OF OPERATION—TYPICAL SHIPS, USING AVERAGE WAGE AND FREIGHT RATES WHICH OBTAINED BEFORE THE EUROPEAN WAR.

In the report of the discussion of the relative merits and costs of different types of ship-propelling machinery, which took place at successive meetings of the Northeast Coast Institute of Engineers and Shipbuilders in England, it was decided that the typical cargo ship of the world at the present time is one having the following dimensions, etc.:

Gross tonnage	4,665
Net registered tonnage	2,930
Dead-weight cargo capacity	7,880
Steaming radius	3,500
Average sea speed (knots)	10½
Indicated horsepower	2,500

A large proportion of the proposed naval auxiliary reserve fleet contemplated by the shipping bill will naturally be vessels of that size. In order to compare the relative costs of operation of an American vessel and of the average existing foreign competitor in the Pacific Ocean, this type of vessel will be used. The cost of wages and of fuel are the main items of expense in the operation of any vessel. This vessel will have a crew of 44 officers and men. From various sources it is found that the cost of wages per month on the Pacific Ocean for an American vessel with an American crew was $2,210 ($26,520 per annum), while for the average foreign competitor with Asiatic crew it was $1,150 per month ($13,800 per annum). The American vessel was thus handicapped in the Pacific trade with an additional cost of $1,060 per month on wages alone ($12,720 per annum), which it is claimed is the principal item in the difference in cost of operation.

Assuming that our typical new freighter is equipped with the modern type of Diesel engine, burning crude oils by internal combustion, there will be certain elements of economy of operation incident to this type of propulsion, as follows:

1. Less cost of wages of operating force, due to the smaller number of men required: There seems to be, in the opinion of experts, a question as to the economy of operation of a Diesel engine (excluding cost of fuel), due to higher initial cost, greater insurance rates, and possibly greater cost of repairs, although the preponderance of opinion points out that there is a tangible saving in cost of operation. For the purpose of this comparison this item will be ignored in order to be entirely conservative.

2. Less cost of fuel for operation: There is absolutely no question concerning the great saving in cost of fuel. To arrive at a comparison we will assume this typical freighter as operating between San Francisco, Cal., and Valparaiso, Chile, and that she makes only five round trips per annum. The distance between ports is 5,140 miles. On each voyage the average consumption of oil will be 231 tons; the same ship fitted with the average steam machinery using coal, will use 597 tons. The cost of coal on the Pacific coast may be taken at $6 per ton, and of oil at $7 per ton. Applying these factors we find a saving in cost of fuel each one-way voyage of $1,965, or $19,650 for five round trips.

3. Gain in freight-carrying capacity, owing to less space occupied by the propelling machinery and less space necessary for storing fuel, which, it has been demonstrated, can be carried in a ship's double bottom—a space in steam-propelled vessels heretofore utilized only for water ballast: The increased capacity incident to Diesel-engined ships is variously estimated by writers on the subject as from 5 to 10 per cent on the dead-weight cargo rating. To be well within conservative limits, the assumption is made in the typical ship that her dead-weight capacity is increased from 7,880 to 8,280 tons (400 tons), a trifle over 5 per cent. Prior to the existing war the freight rates between Chile and the United States, on the average of all bulk commodities, is shown by the Consular Reports to have been approximately $12 per ton. At the present time they have increased about 80 per cent over that figure, and in the case of nitrates, the principal article of export, the increase has been 100 per cent. Again, taking a conservative estimate, we will assume an average freight rate of but $8 per ton, weight or measurement. In a 400-ton increase in capacity this will amount to $3,200 per one-way voyage, or $32,000 per annum for five round trips, in favor of the typical ship having Diesel engines.

RÉSUMÉ—PACIFIC COAST.

Typical new American ship with Diesel engines, American crew, American wages, and American standard of food, versus typical existing foreign competitor with average efficiency of steam propulsion, Asiatic crew cheap wages, and poor food, both vessels making five round trips a year between the west coast of the United States and the west coast of South America, a distance of about 5,000 miles:

Increased annual cost for American ship:
Wages of 44 officers and men	$12,720
Food at 50 cents per day instead of 20 cents	4,752
		$17,472
Decreased annual cost for American ship:
Saving in cost of oil fuel over coal		18,644
Net annual saving for American ship		1,172
Annual increase in earning capacity of American ship from 400 tons additional freight space		32,000
Operating returns in favor of American ship, per annum		33,172

ATLANTIC COAST.

For the typical bulk carrier on the Atlantic coast the conditions are somewhat different from those on the Pacific coast, as follows:

1. The difference in cost of crews was less, as competitive vessels in these waters do not operate with Asiatic crews, and their standard of food is higher than for Asiatic crews.

The American scale of wages for officers and crew can be taken as the same as those for corresponding vessels on the Pacific coast, but for foreign competitors with Caucasian crews on the Atlantic coast the average wage scale for the typical freighter will be approximately $1,500 per month ($18,000 per annum). Food cost, 30 cents per day at least.

2. Coal being more plentiful and the various seaports nearer to the mines, the cost is less than on the Pacific coast. The ports on the North Atlantic particularly are farther removed from the oil wells, and in consequence the average cost of oil is higher than on the Pacific coast.

The average cost of coal at various Atlantic ports will be $4 per ton, while the average cost of fuel oil should be taken at $8.75 per ton, a price somewhat above the normal average.

The average length of voyage will be assumed the same as from San Francisco to Valparaiso (5,140 miles), as the distance from New York to Rio Janeiro is 4,441 miles, and from New York to Montevideo is 5,497 miles. The freight rates are approximately the same as those on the Pacific coast, and for purposes of comparison we will assume it to be an average of only $8 per ton, weight or measurement freight.

Applying these modifications for the Atlantic coast to the typical freighter assumed we would have the following:

RÉSUMÉ—ATLANTIC COAST.

Typical new American ship with Diesel engines, American crew, American wages, and American standard of food versus typical existing foreign competitor with average efficiency of steam propulsion, European crew, fair wages, and fair food, both vessels making five round trips a year between the east coast of the United States and the east coast of South America, a distance of 5,000 miles.

Increased annual cost for American ship:
Wages of 44 officers and men	$8,520
Food at 50 cents per day instead of 30 cents	3,204
		$11,724.00
Decreased annual cost for American ship:
Saving in cost of oil fuel over coal		7,672.00
Net annual loss for American ship		4,052.00
Annual increase in earning capacity of American ship from 400 tons additional freight space		32,000.00
Operating returns in favor of American ship per annum		27,948.00

SHIPS FOR PASSENGERS AND FREIGHT.

As has been stated, the larger number of the proposed naval auxiliary fleet will naturally be freight carriers, and, consequently, of slow and economical speed. While the internal-combustion engine is peculiarly adapted to this class of merchant vessel, there are limitations to the size of this engine. Under existing conditions it would be impracticable to use internal-combustion engines of above 5,000 horsepower (twin screw), and the use of the Diesel engine is therefore practically limited to slow freight ships of not exceeding 5,000 gross tons.

There would be in this fleet of board ships a number of vessels of about 6,500 gross tons and 18-knot maximum speed for passenger and high-class freight service, and such vessels would be utilized in time of war as transports. This class of vessel requires machinery of over 5,000 horsepower, which is beyond the limit of power for which internal-combustion engines may be used. However, such great progress has been made in steam machinery that a very pronounced saving in fuel can be made by modern installations. Upon certain routes, where American steamship lines are desirable, further economies may be made by burning oil instead of coal.

As illustrative of what can be accomplished in the South American trade we will make the following comparisons:

The steamship Havana, of the Ward Line, running to the West Indies, is of the typical size, and the following data are well authenticated. This ship was built in 1907, and, consequently, represents a vessel somewhat more efficient than the average of all passenger steamers of similar size and type:

Gross tonnage	6,391
Dead-weight capacity	5,084
Horsepower	5,000
Bunker capacity (tons)	1,010
Speed at sea (average knots)	16.6
Coal consumption per day (tons)	145
Number of crew (including 39 firemen and coal passers)	147
Monthly wage cost	$5,623
Cost of food ($12 per man)	$1,740

The same data would apply to the typical existing foreign vessel to be met in competition, with the exception of wages and food. The pay and cost of food for the foreign ship was practically 30 per cent less. Hence we would have for the operating expenses of the average existing coal-burning foreign steamer the following, taking a 3,200-mile 8-day voyage or one round trip per month:

Wages (70 per cent of $5,623)	$3,936
Food (70 per cent of $1,740)	1,218
Fuel (145 tons per day, at $4 per ton, 16 days)	9,280
Monthly operation charges, existing foreign steamer	14,434

In the proposed American steamer with up-to-date geared turbine, burning oil fuel, the crew would be reduced to 124 men by cutting out 21 men from the fireroom force and 2 from the steward's force. There would be also a decided decrease in fuel consumption, so that the operating expenses would be as follows for the same service:

Wages, 124 men at American rates ($5,623—$1,080)	$4,543
Food, 124 men at $12 per month	1,488
Fuel (65 tons of oil per day, at $8.75 per ton) for 16 steaming days	9,100
Monthly operation charges, new American steamer	15,131

In addition the oil-burning American vessel, by carrying this fuel oil in her double bottoms, will gain at least 10 per cent in her freight-carrying capacity, or, at a very conservative estimate, she can carry 500 tons additional revenue-producing freight.

NOTE.—The proportionate gain in freight-carrying space is greater in a faster vessel than in a slow one. The faster a vessel the greater must be her bunker space, which correspondingly reduces the freight space. Hence when bunkers are eliminated and oil carried in double bottoms there is a greater proportionate gain in freight-carrying capacity than in slower vessels, which do not have to carry so much fuel.

A very conservative freight-rate estimate for a 3,200-mile voyage is $4 per ton (weight or measurement). One round trip per month would give an increased earning capacity of $4,000 in favor of the American vessel (500 tons additional freight at $4 each way).

A further saving in oil-burning vessels is a marked reduction in the cost of upkeep of boilers, cost of painting the ship, etc., which items, however, are ignored in this comparison.

RÉSUMÉ—ATLANTIC COAST.

Typical new fuel-oil-burning ship, with geared turbines, American crew, American wages, and American standard of food, versus typical existing foreign competitor, with average efficiency of steam propulsion, European crew, fair wages, and fair food, both vessels making one round trip a month between the Atlantic coast of the United States and the east coast of South America on a route of 3,200 miles.

Increased annual cost for American ship:
Wages	$7,284
Food	3,240
		$10,524
Decreased annual cost for American ship:
Saving in cost of oil fuel over coal		2,160
Net annual loss for American ship		8,364
Annual increase in earning capacity of American ship from 500 tons additional freight space		$48,000
Operating returns in favor of American ship, per annum		39,636

To illustrate what actually has been done on the Pacific coast, the following data concerning the 5,218-ton American steamship President is quoted from "International Marine Engineering" of July, 1914 (p. 283–284):

"The President, which has just returned to service, has been converted at the Seattle yards on a contract working time of 35 days. Her capacity is 5,600 barrels of oil, and on her maiden run following the change this fast steamer added one knot to her steaming speed.

"In making the oil installation the vessel's double bottom was converted into fuel tanks to carry her capacity.

"Using coal, this vessel formerly filled her bunkers with about 1,350 tons upon each call at Seattle. The operation required nine working hours, which frequently meant from 12 to 15 hours, including waste time. Now the vessel can fill her tanks while working cargo, thereby having a considerable saving of time, which is no insignificant item, because these vessels are almost constantly moving and running on a schedule almost as good as that of an express train.

"Roughly estimating the value of coal at $3.30 per ton, and that of fuel oil at 80 cents per barrel ($5.60 per ton), it is figured that the President will effect a saving in fuel cost alone of between $800 and $1,000 per voyage. (She makes four voyages each month.)

"There are, however, other important features of oil burning which appeal to her owners. With the elimination of coal bunkers each vessel has approximately 600 tons of additional cargo space, which is of much value, considering the demand for such space, especially at certain seasons. Probably the most important economy effected, however, is that in crew. Formerly the President carried a total of 136 men, and now her roster is but 113. The reduction of 23 men is apportioned, 21 men in the engine department and 2 in the steward's department, the latter being eliminated following the reduction of the fireroom force. Whereas the engine-room crew formerly numbered 44, there are now but 23 required. In addition to the saving in wages and subsistence of these men, the quarters formerly occupied by them have been turned into added cargo space."

Of course it may be said that our foreign competitors can also build these modern ships, but the fact remains that they are handicapped by their existing fleet of coal-burning vessels with expensive types of steam machinery, which they can not afford to put into the scrap heap. This will give us an advantage for a period of at least six years before the competing fleets can be brought up to the same state of efficiency as this proposed American fleet of new ships.

The United States is peculiarly well endowed by its natural resources to enter into a world-wide competition in shipping, since it will be reduced to a battle for the supremacy in economical equipment. Oil will be the most vital factor in this competition on account of its many advantages, and, as is well known, 60 per cent of the world's supply is within the borders of the United States. It is a matter of common knowledge that American shipowners are deterred at present from equipping their new vessels for oil burning owing to the extreme fluctuations in the price of oil. Fortunately the Government has reserved large tracts of oil-producing lands from the public domains, and should the machinations of private producers tend to deter the development of our merchant marine, it is, of course, possible to resort to the Government's own oil supply.

NOTE.—While the foregoing comparisons were based on wage scales and freight rates as they existed prior to the war, it should not be overlooked that since the outbreak of war the wage scale on foreign ships has increased rapidly, until at the present time it approximates the American scale of wages. Freight rates have increased enormously, as is generally known.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF MERCHANT VESSELS.

Every reasonable objection to the ownership and operation of merchant vessels has been removed in the bill as reported by the committee. Those who favor such ownership and operation are of opinion that the committee has gone too far in limiting such ownership and operation.

The bill provides that the board may, if in its judgment such action is necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, through a corporation or corporations to be organized, in which the United States shall own the majority of the stock, own and operate such vessels. The time within which vessels may be so operated is limited to five years after the present war in Europe shall end. The committee regards this a necessary power to be vested in the board. Whether it may have occasion to exercise it or not will depend upon the readiness of private interests to take over either by purchase or charter of the vessels constructed or purchased by the board, and employ them in serving our foreign commerce, particularly with the east and west coasts of South America, and from our Pacific ports to the Far East. The board may, if that trade is not being adequately served, employ such vessels in the trade with Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico, in addition to the Panama Canal Zone, the Philippine Islands, Guam, and Tutuila.

The American Hawaiian and Luckenbach steamship companies have withdrawn most of their vessels from the intercoastal trade, and they are now employed in the foreign trade, leaving the coastwise trade inadequately served. They justify themselves upon the ground that their earnings are much larger in the foreign than in the coastwise trade. This is no doubt true, yet they are not in a position to object to the board exercising the powers vested in it to see that that trade is adequately served to the limited extent provided in the bill.

The question resolves itself into this: Shall the great commercial interests of the United States be paramount to the interests of the vessel owners, who, under existing law, have the monopoly of the coastwise trade, and yet exercise the right to withdraw their vessels from that trade whenever it suits their convenience or profit?

In that connection it will be interesting to read the testimony of representatives of those companies at a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the city of Washington on April 24, 25, and 26, 1916.

OCEAN FREIGHT RATES.

Since the 1st of August, 1914, when the war in Europe began, ocean freight rates have increased enormously—in some cases as much as 1,000 per cent. This is true not only in our trade with Europe but in our trade with South America and the Far East, Australia, and South Africa.

In response to a request by the committee, Dr. E. E. Pratt, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, furnished the committee with very full and complete data on the subject of ocean freight rates from the ports of New York, Boston, New Orleans, and Seattle. The tables may be found beginning on page 772 of the hearings, as here given.

OCEAN FREIGHT RATES FROM NEW YORK TO EUROPE—INCREASE FROM JANUARY 1, 1914, TO JANUARY 1, 1916.

The report prepared by the New York district office of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, referring to increases in (1) berth rates and (2) charter rates from New York, says:

1. INCREASE IN STEAMSHIP BERTH RATES.

The increase in the steamship berth rates from the port of New York to various European ports is shown in the accompanying tables, which show the rates on sack flour, compressed cotton, grain, provisions, and measurement goods. These tables afford, therefore, an excellent basis for the study of the general increase in freight rates resulting from the scarity of cargo tonnage and from other conditions.

The table showing rates for measurement goods covers the rates for practically all articles of general merchandise as well as for a large group of miscellaneous products, including steel products, machinery, and other manufactured articles.

The rates for cotton, grain, provisions, and sack flour furnish a sufficient basis also for deductions regarding the increase in freight rates on bulk commodities carried by regular-line steamships.

The increases between January 1, 1914, and December 31, 1915, in the steamship berth rates vary considerably for the specified commodities. The general increase during the period has been between 500 and 1,000 per cent. The increase in rates for grain has been particularly marked.

On January 31, 1914, the berth rate for grain from New York to Liverpool was $0.0607 per 100 pounds and on December 31, 1915, $0.67, an increase of 1,000 per cent. Moreover, on the latter date, with the exception of movement by Government arrangements, it was practically impossible to transport grain in regular-line steamships, the bulk of the grain movement having been turned over to independent vessels chartered for the purpose.

A similar increase is seen in the berth rates on cotton from New York. On January 3, 1914, the rate per 100 pounds on cotton from New York to Liverpool was 28 cents, and on December 31, 1915, $2.25.

The same general ratio of increase is also noticeable in the berth rates for provisions, sack flour, and measurement goods.

Berth rates for measurement goods during the period studied have also shown a marked increase. On January 3, 1914, the rate per 100 pounds for the carrying of manufactured articles from New York to Liverpool was 21 cents, and on December 31, 1915, 63 cents.

While the most noticeable increases in steamship berth rates have been in the rates from the United States to European ports, still the great demand for cargo space for trans-Atlantic tonnage has caused similar increases in the rates to other parts of the world. One very striking illustration of this fact is the rate on cement from New York to the River Plate. Previous to the war rates on cement from New York to the River Plate were very low, about $5 per ton, but to-day an export manager of a large cement manufacturing house in New York reports that he is in a position to quote a selling price for cement in New York of 68 cents per barrel or about $3.40 per ton, while the freight rate on cement from New York to River Plate ports is $16 per ton. The great discrepancy between the cost of the manufactured article and the ocean transportation rate is evident. Moreover, in this connection it should be remembered that the rates on cement from England to South American ports have not shown so great a relative increase as the rates from New York to South American ports. At the time the quoted rate from New York to the River Plate was $14 per ton the rate from Liverpool to the River Plate was approximately $9 per ton.

2. INCREASE IN CHARTER RATES.

The great increases in the steamship-berth rates is paralleled by the increases in the steamship charter rates for full cargoes from New York to European ports. The bulk of the freight tonnage in foreign trade is moved by tramp steamers which are owned by independent steamship companies and are chartered through steamship agents and brokers to individuals and firms desiring steamers for the movement of full cargoes.

No industry is more directly affected by conditions of the demand and supply than the steamship industry and the creation of a great demand for cargo space in any section of the world's markets has a direct effect upon steamship charter rates and berth rates in all parts of the world. Charter rates fluctuate directly in relation to the available cargo tonnage and the demand for cargo space. The great increase in charter rates, therefore, presents the best evidence of the scarcity of tonnage at the present time and the need of additional tonnage if any relief is to be expected.

Grain charters: Charters for grain are usually based on a charter of a steamship for the transportation of a certain number of quarters, each quarter consisting of approximately 480 pounds, or 8 bushels. On January 3, 1914, when the movement of grain was at a very low ebb, the charter rate from New York to English ports was 2 shillings 1½ pence ($0.52) per quarter. On December 31, 1915, the charter rate was about 13 shillings 6 pence ($3.29) per quarter. The charter rate on December 31, 1915, on grain from New York to Mediterranean ports was 18 shillings ($4.38), while the average rate for grain between the United States and other European ports was between 12 and 14 shillings ($2.92 to $3.41) per quarter.

One interesting feature in connection with the increase in charter rates for grain is the fact that it occurred largely during the late summer and fall of 1915. In the fall of 1914, although there was a very large demand for cargo space for grain movement, the charter rates ranged between 5 and 8 shillings ($1.22 to $1.95) per quarter. Even as late as April 3, 1915, the charter rates on grain from New York to European ports were about 9 shillings ($2.19), but during September, October, November, and December, 1915, there was a very great increase in the rates, showing not only a greater demand for cargo tonnage, but also a decrease in the available supply.

Coal charters. The movement of coal between the United States and foreign countries is carried on primarily on a charter basis, as full cargo shipments are made. The increase in the charter rates on coal therefore furnishes another criterion of the shipping situation. Previous to the outbreak of the European war there was very little movement of coal from the United States to European or other ports. On July 3, 1914, however, a schooner was chartered for the movement of coal from Philadelphia to Calais at $1.10 per ton. As a result of the conditions resulting in a scarcity of steamship tonnage a steamer was chartered on December 31, 1915, for the movement of coal from Norfolk to Boston at $3.25 per ton dead-weight.

Petroleum charters: In the foreign trade petroleum is carried largely in tank steamers. There is therefore a definite limit to the amount of steamship tonnage available for the handling of petroleum in bulk. Nevertheless the increase in the charter rates for petroleum has been marked, and it is practically impossible at the present time to secure charters for tank steamers at any rate on account of the great scarcity of tonnage.

On April 4, 1914, the charter rates for the movement of case oil from New York to the Far East was 17½ cents per case. On December 31, 1915, a steamer was chartered from New York to Australia at a charter rate of $1.50 per case, and a sailing vessel was chartered for the movement of petroleum in barrels from Philadelphia to the United Kingdom at 13 shillings 6 pence ($3.29) per ton.

Miscellaneous charters: A great part of the movement of freight by chartered vessels is carried on under different forms of charter. There has been a marked tendency in shipping circles to adopt the time charter, and the increase in the rates for time charters for steamships and sailing vessels has been remarkable. Time charters for individual steamships are usually based on (1) the payment of a lump sum covering the period of the voyage, (2) payment on a monthly basis, or (3) a payment of a lump sum per ton of dead-weight capacity of vessel.

A typical time charter in January, 1914, for a steamer in the trans-Atlantic trade, for one round trip, was made at the rate of 3 shillings 7½ pence ($0.88) per ton dead-weight. In December, 1915, a steamer of about the same tonnage was chartered for one round trip in the trans-Atlantic trade on a basis of 30 shillings ($7.30) per ton dead-weight.

This illustration is typical of a number of others of similar character. Thus, a steamer of about 2,500 tons was chartered for 12 months in April, 1914, on the basis of 2 shilling 10½ pence ($0.70) per ton dead-weight. In October, 1915, not only was it extremely difficult to secure a charter covering so long a period of time, but a steamer of approximately the same tonnage was chartered for one round trip from the United States to the Far East on the basis of 15 shillings ($3.65) per ton dead-weight. Time charters for larger vessels, especially for particular trades, have gone as high as $54,000 per month, as in the case of American vessels used in the cotton trade with Germany last fall when it was possible to ship raw cotton to Bremen direct.

Another striking illustration of the tremendous increase in charter rates is shown by the charter of a small steamship of 989 tons for the West Indian and coastwise trade, on December 31, 1915, for 12 months at the rate of $7,000 per month.

Charters to South America: The increase in charter rates for the movement of goods between the United States and South America is of particular interest. On January 3, 1914, a steamer of about 3,200 tons was chartered for the movement of coal from the United States to Rio de Janeiro at 15 shillings ($3.65) per ton. On December 31, 1915, a Norwegian steamer of only 2,400 tons was chartered for the movement of coal from Atlantic ports to Rio de Janeiro on a basis of 52 shillings 6 pence ($12.70), and a schooner of only 1,000 tons was chartered for the movement of coal from Norfolk to Para on the basis of $7.50 per ton. In view of the fact that the cost of the coal at Norfolk was approximately $2.85, the relation of the steamship rate to the cost of material was extremely noticeable.

One of the commodities that has been severely affected by the increase in the freight rates is lumber. On January 3, 1914, a Russian steamer of about 1,500 tons was chartered for the movement of lumber from one of the Gulf ports to the River plate at 105 shillings ($25.55) per standard (2,000 board feet). On December 31, 1915, a sailing bark of 1,500 tons registry was chartered for the movement of timber from the Gulf to British ports, a shorter voyage, at 320 shillings ($77.86) per standard.

Another striking illustration of the great increase in the freight rates during the last 12 months is shown by the fact that on January 3, 1914, a steamer of 2,200 tons register was chartered for the New York and South American trade at the rate of 4 shillings 7½ pence ($1.13) per ton dead-weight, and on December 31, 1915, a Norwegian bark of 1,500 tons register was chartered for the movement of nitrate from South America to the United States on a basis of 70 shillings ($17.03) per ton dead-weight.

General summary: The above tables and facts bring out four salient points:

1. A very steady and remarkable increase in steamship rates from New York to all parts of the world is noticeable. This has been particularly true of steamship berth rates, and even been more marked in the matter of charter rates.

2. A scarcity in steamship tonnage, which was noticeable at the outbreak of the war on account of the withdrawal of the German and Austrian merchant shipping and the requisition of a large part of the British marine under Admiralty orders have been instrumental in causing a decrease in the supply of steamship tonnage. The decrease of steamship tonnage has been accompanied by a steady growth in the demand for cargo space for the movement of goods from New York to Europe. As a result, steamship rates have continued and will continue to mount unless some changes can be brought about in the present situation.

2. The most important feature of the situation from the standpoint of the United States is the fact that the tremendous demand for cargo space, coupled with the scarcity of steamship tonnage in the trans-Atlantic trade, has seriously affected the trade of the United States with neutral and outlying countries, such as South America, Australia, South Africa, and the Far East. It is practically impossible to secure any tonnage, either sailing or steam, except at exorbitant rates for the transportation of goods from the United States to those countries. This is due to the length of the voyage and to the fact that greater profits can be secured in the shorter voyage at trans-Atlantic rates.

4. There is a general feeling among shippers of goods from the port of New York that the Government might be able to materially assist the situation by securing and operating vessels which would be entered into service for the purpose of moving American goods to such markets as Australia, the Far East, and South Africa, for which at the present time it is practically impossible to secure cargo space at a rate which will enable the customer to purchase the goods.

Boston: Increase in ocean freight rates from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1916, to London, Liverpool, Genoa, Naples, Copenhagen; and from Liverpool and Buenos Aires to Boston.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Boston, March 10, 1916.

In regard to the ocean freight rate investigation I beg to inclose herewith some material as follows:

(1) Data furnished by Mr. J. M. McLachland, of the International Mercantile Marine Co., 84 State Street, Boston, Mass., for the White Star and Leland Lines, as follows:

Freight rates from Boston to London.
Freight rates from Boston to Genoa.
Freight rates from Boston to Naples.
Freight rates from Boston to Liverpool.
Freight rates from Liverpool to Boston.

(2) Data furnished by Mr. Porter, of Furness, Withy & Co., 4 Liberty Square, Boston, Mass., agents for the Warren Line, Furness Line, etc., as follows:

Freight rates from Boston to Liverpool.

(3) Data furnished by Mr. F. H. Ryan, of A. C. Lombard's Sons, 110 State Street, Boston, Mass., agents for the Scandinavian-American Line and for the Houston Line, as follows:

Freight rates from Boston to Copenhagen.
Freight rates from Buenos Aires to Boston.

(4) Data furnished by Mr. L. H. Peters, foreign freight agent of the New York Central and Boston & Albany Railroads, as per post-card circulars they issue regularly, as to freight rates from Boston to various points.

Letters sent out to a hundred or more private firms produced no results, probably because these firms did not wish to divulge their rates or else had not kept a record of same for the dates wanted.

Very truly, yours,
W. A. GRAHAM CLARK,
Commercial Agent.

New Orleans: Increase in ocean freight rates from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1916.

NEW ORLEANS, March 10, 1916.

In compliance with the instructions given in your letter of February 2, dictated by Commercial Agent Jones, there are inclosed herewith ocean freight-rate schedules covering the traffic between New Orleans and European ports. These schedules are as complete as it has been possible to make them from the data available. New Orleans ships very little outside of the first two classifications on the prepared schedule, and it has been impossible to obtain rates that would be of any value for comparative purposes on steel products, machinery, mineral and petroleum products, and miscellaneous manufactured goods. A large amount of oil is credited to the export figures of this port, but this moves in full cargo lots chiefly from Baton Rouge.

The figures supplied in the inclosed statements are taken from the books of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, the files of the Lumber Trade Journal, files of the rate sheets issued by the Texas Transport & Terminal Co., A. H. Clement & Co., Ross & Heyn, and George Gerdes & Co., supplemented by figures taken from the actual manifests of the Leyland, Vogemann, Head, Pinillos, Gans, Norway-Mexico Gulf, Swedish-American-Mexico, Maclay-Prentice Co., and Pierce Cotonlera lines.

I am giving on these sheets the rates as quoted in the various sources of information, with footnotes indicating any variation in the unit of quantity. It would be misleading to the compiler of any report from this data for me to make any attempt at reducing these rates to a common basis. The fluctuation in sterling exchange has forced a good many changes in the methods of quoting during the last six months. For example, the cottonseed oil rate has ordinarily been quoted in shillings per barrel, but since the 1st of October a number of lines have changed their quotations to cents per hundred pounds to avoid the uncertainty of exchange fluctuations. To bring the shilling rates down to a dollar and cents basis due consideration must be given to the various exchange rates ruling at the time these quotations were made. In other cases the unit of quantity on which quotation is made has been changed. For instance, pine quotations are in some cases in shillings per standard and in others in dollars per thousand feet. This can readily be brought down to a common unit of quantity, but I believe such conversion should be done by the person making use of the figures rather than by the compiler of these charts, as he will then know exactly what has been done.

Yours, very truly, E. E. JUDD,
Commercial Agent in Charge.

Another communication from the commercial agent in charge of the New Orleans district office of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce may also be of interest in connection with the shipping situation at the Gulf ports. This letter was in answer to a request from the bureau that the agent look into the possibilities of securing a vessel for the movement of mahogany from Central America to New Orleans for a large plant in Cincinnati:

NEW ORLEANS, March 8, 1916.

I have your letter of March 6, dictated by Commercial Agent Jones, inclosing copy of a letter from the Freiberg Lumber Co. to the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, asking for advice as to the conditions in shipping between Central America and the Gulf ports. I can say, in general, that charters for Central American business have been practically unobtainable for the past several months, charter rates being way above what this traffic can bear. Steamers are absolutely out of the question, as they have all gone into the European trade with the exception of the regular line vessels carrying general cargo down and bringing bananas and other fruit back. There have been a few small sailing vessels on the market from time to time at high rates. The regular liners are not available for mahogany business, as they will accept such cargo only in small quantities and at their regular shipping points. Most of the mahogany is loaded at small ports not regularly touched by these ships.

The abnormal prices asked for tonnage in the Central American trade are only a logical result of the European situation. With cotton rates at $2.90 per hundred pounds to Liverpool, $3.15 to Havre, $3 to Barcelona, and $3.60 to Gothenberg, and pig iron bringing $25 a ton, it is only natural that shipowners have thrown their vessels into the European trade. Shippers to Europe are literally begging for space at these prices. There has been a great deal of speculating in tonnage, but the rates are traceable directly to the enormous outbound traffic. I just heard to-day of one speculator who paid 170 shillings per deadweight ton for a vessel with a capacity of sixteen to eighteen hundred tons. The market has dropped a little since then, so that the ship is only worth about 140 shillings now. This man stands to lose several thousand dollars on the venture in spite of the high rates prevailing.

I am going further into this subject in the next day or so and will report if I find anything further of interest. I shall also do a little scouting around in shipping circles here and see if I can't pick up something for the Freiberg Co. I think I know where there is an 1,800-ton sailing vessel which might be glad to make a contract for mahogany business.

Very truly, yours,

E. E. JUDD,
Commercial Agent in Charge.

P. S.—In talking over the shipping situation with Mr. De Witt to-day I mentioned that a mahogany company wanted a 2,000-ton steamer. He said if he could find any such craft he would like to buy three of them at a good, fat figure, and pay a fine commission to the wizard who produced them. He said, "I don't care about age, beauty, or flag, if they will float and can sail without danger of being shot to pieces. And I can load them with something more profitable than mahogany."

Seattle: Increase in ocean freight rates to the Far East from January 1, 1914, to January 1, 1916.

The following statement regarding the ocean freight situation at Seattle on March 2, 1916, was prepared by Mr. W. B. Henderson, commercial agent in charge of the Seattle district office of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce:

SEATTLE, WASH., March 2, 1916.

Referring again to your communication of February 2, in which you requested a detailed report on ocean freight rates for specified commodities and periods between Seattle and foreign ports, I have the honor to submit herewith the result of the investigation on the sheets that were furnished by the bureau.

In connection with this report I am submitting herewith, I have to state my utter inability to cover all commodities, all periods, and all destinations. However, the report is as complete as it could possibly be, owing to the unsettled conditions in shipping facilities and the entire absence of published tariff schedules since the breaking out of the European war.

My investigation necessitated about 35 calls for interviews with managers of ocean steamship companies, commercial organizations, and transportation companies. In most every case on first presenting the matter to a steamship line or the manager of a transportation bureau I was met with the blunt announcement "there is no such thing now as an ocean freight tariff." They also said that old schedules had been destroyed. Nevertheless, by persistence I secured copies of the 1914 tariff schedules for most lines operating in and out of this port. As to rate quotations for the latter part of 1915 and for January, 1916, there are none, or practically none. Most of the ships are working for all they can get or what they think they can get. There are, however, exceptions to this state of affairs. These exceptions are in the case of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha and the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the two regular Japanese lines. The rates published by these companies in the tariff schedules for 1914 are more nearly in conformity with the charges they made for freight during the whole of 1915. For 1916 (January), their rates were perceptibly higher, but in nowise to be likened to the enormous increases asked and obtained by others—notably the chartered lines.

This investigation brought out some anomalous conditions bordering onto a paradoxical aspect, inasmuch as there are a greater number of lines in the trade, a large increase in the number of vessels entering and clearing from this port and Tacoma, while at the same time freight in these ports was never so congested and exporters so hard put to secure tonnage space. Yet at the same time, also, this section is manufacturing and producing but a small proportion more than it was at this time two years ago.

This condition, with its peculiar aspects, is accounted for by the arrangements that the transcontinental railroads have with the regular steamship companies plying to Orient ports. The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul and the Northern Pacific Railroads have an understanding, or a contract, as it were, with the two regular Japanese steamship companies for practically their entire space. They apportion this space so much to New York, so much to Chicago, to St. Louis, or Kansas City, as the case may be, and get the benefit of the rail charges on the long haul. This practically leaves the local exporter out of the deal, and as a consequence he must stay out of the business or else fall back on the chartered lines and tramp vessels with their advance in ocean freight rates of from 100 to 1,000 per cent.

This situation applies to a large extent to the native products of this section, such as lumber, box shooks, wheat and flour, and canned salmon. Then, too, there appears to be a discrimination on the part of the Japanese lines on certain commodities, as, for instance, a representative of one of the largest manufacturers and exporters of flour told me that the Japanese lines had allotted so much space for flour from Puget Sound ports to China. The amount of space which he mentioned is about two-fifths of the product for export by the mills of this section. This, he inferred, was to the advantage of Japan, which country is supplying the other three-fifths to China from her own mills.

Another large export firm here claims that it can not get space promised at any rates for the next five months. He stated a specific case where he had for export a product which is now being booked by the steamship companies at the rate of $35 per ton. He tried for space some months ago and finally secured space from San Francisco on the condition, however, that the shipment be transported from Seattle over the lines of a certain railroad named. It so happens that in order to transport the goods over the particular line named that he must ship from Seattle to Denver and thence to San Francisco, thus making the freight rates prohibitive. He is now in the market for the same commodity on the lines of the specified railroads at a point nearer San Francisco, while his consignment is lying in the Seattle warehouse.

No living man could make a complete analysis of the ocean freight rates here as they present themselves now, and only a very poor comparison can be had. So far as securing space is concerned for ships booked to sail in the near future, it is out of the question. A few orders are being booked for four or five months ahead and it would appear that unless the exporter received enormous profits on commodities exported a year ago, when ocean freight rates were comparatively normal, it is hard to see where he can get any profit now (even if he secures space) at the abnormally high rates. Yet they are all in the market for tonnage space, and as a consequence new shipping agencies are daily springing up, old lines are adding extra vessels, and contracts are being let for building new ships. Besides the Frank Waterhouse Co. and the H. F. Ostrander Co., who are both chartering a large number of vessels, Griffiths & Sons, old-time shippers, have chartered several tramp vessels and impressed them into the trade, and recently a local concern has received a contract to build immediately a million-dollar ship.

I am herewith inclosing the sheets filled out as fully as the figures can be obtained. I have also supplemented it by a statement showing the present rates that have been secured on tonnage from Seattle to Vladivostok, and I am also submitting a partial list of the parties interviewed in obtaining these rates

Very truly, yours,

W. B. HENDERSON, Commercial Agent.

I interviewed the following concerns here re the ocean freight rates:

Mr. B. J. Orvinsck, of W. R. Grace & Co., as to the import rates from Chilean points (Valparaiso, as specified in the report). He could only give me rates on copper.

Mr. Fawkner, of Fawkner-Currie Co., who operate a steamship line between here and South America, as to import rates on nitrates from Valparaiso.

Mr. W. A. Mears, of the transportation bureau of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, on rates generally. No particular information.

Mr. W. D. Benson, manager of the Pacific Coast-Oriental Tariff Bureau, who is also connected with Frank Waterhouse & Co., as to rates generally. He supplied me with the greater portion of the rates for 1914 and part of 1915, and furnished me with a number of schedules.

Mr. F. M. Studley, manager of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, on rates generally to the Orient. He supplied me with rates on several commodities to Hongkong and Shanghai.

Mr. Manion, of the Blue Funnel Line, supplied me with rates to London.

Mr. D. W. Burchard, of the Hamburg-American Line. No information. His line is interned and out of business, and the documents were burned at a recent fire.

Mr. T. Stuart, recently connected with Robinson & Morrison, furnished some information regarding import rates to Sydney.

Mr. Pettibone, formerly of the Canadian Trading Co., now of the American Trading Co., furnished me with rates on lumber to Hongkong and Shanghai. Mr. Hodge, of the Northwest Trading Co., furnished rates on flour, bar iron, sheet iron, wire, and some commodity rates to Shanghai and Hongkong.

Mr. Parrott, of the firm of Parrott & Co., brokers, furnished general information.

Mr. Erickson, of the American Express Co., gave me considerable information regarding rates, especially on the old schedules of 1914.

Mr. W. S. Allen, assistant manager of the Fisher Flouring Mills, furnished me valuable information regarding export rates to the Orient on flour.

Mr. Robert Hill, manager of the Merchants' Exchange, gave me valuable assistance regarding rates on flour and wheat to London.

Mr. H. F. Ostrander furnished valuable information as to rates on a number of commodities to Shanghai and Hongkong.

The following shipping agencies and exporters were visited in Tacoma, in connection with the investigation of ocean freight rates:

Mr. McKune, chairman transportation bureau, Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Giles Smith, acting secretary, Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Hans Heidner, importer and exporter.

Mr. J. B. Van Fossen, agent for Osaka Shosen Kaisha.

Mr. J. T. Steeb, customhouse broker.

Others interviewed in Seattle are as follows:

A representative of M. Furuya & Co.

Northwest Trading Co.

Mr. Pettibone, of the American Trading Co.

The agent of the Norwegian-American Line, for information re freight rates to Scandinavian ports.

A representative of W. R. Grace & Co., who are agents for the Johnson Line, regarding rates to Copenhagen.

The vice consul for Norway.

A representative of Fawkner-Currie Co., shipping agents.

SAN FRANCISCO—OCEAN FREIGHT RATES.

The committee was unable to get full report of ocean freight rates from San Francisco for reasons stated by the commercial agent of the Department of Commerce in that city in the following communication:

MARCH 11, 1916.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE:

Referring to bureau letter of February 2, calling for data on ocean freight rates, and telegram of the 10th instant, stating that such data should be mailed to-day, there is inclosed such meager material as it has been possible to collect to date.

Partial information is given as to rates to Hongkong, Manila, and Shanghai, furnished by the Toyo Kisen Kaisha; to Sydney, Australia, furnished by the Union Steamship Co. of New Zealand (Ltd.); to Copenhagen, Denmark, furnished by the East Asiatic Co. (Ltd.).

There has been no particular disposition to withhold information, except in one case, where the company did not care to go on record at all, but there has been a disposition to promise and not fulfill; parties on whom I had particularly depended failed to supply the desired information, though personal calls were made in addition to written requests. Calls made yesterday, after receipt of telegram from the bureau, brought forth renewed promises of data within a day or so from some of the concerns, but in other cases I was informed that it was simply impossible to get out the information, the general excuse being that it required too much work for an overburdened staff. This is borne out by the fact that several steamship companies are working evenings. Mr. H. E. Moore, traffic manager of W. R. Grace & Co., advised me yesterday that he had been obliged to neglect the ordinary correspondence for the past two weeks because of the great number of telegrams, cables, and conferences claiming his attention.

I had been particularly depending on W. R. Grace & Co. for information as to rates to the west coast of South America. Mr. Moore stated that rates in that direction had not advanced to the extent that they had in other trade routes—that, for example, the old rate of $12 on general merchandise had risen to but $14 per ton.

The Toyo Kisen Kaisha is unable to raise its rates on boats subsidized by the Japanese Government, though seeking authority to do so; on its chartered boats, however, the rates are considerably higher and are quoted only from boat to boat. This applies to the Java-Pacific Line and casual sailings, rates running anywhere from $30 to $60 per ton.

The closing of the Panama Canal is to some extent responsible for the present high rates, as prior to its closing there were more ships available for the oriental trade; the early opening of the canal will undoubtedly supply more carriers and place rates on a more stable basis, though they will probably remain high for some time to come. Mr. Otto Jelstrup, general agent of the East Asiatic Co. (Ltd.), advises that with the reopening of the canal a fleet of Danish motor ships will touch at San Francisco every three weeks westbound.

Mr. Back, of the Union Steam Ship Co. of New Zealand (Ltd.), in speaking of the difficulty of supplying data for this report, stated that they had offered $115,000 per month for the charter of one steamer and it had been refused, $140,000 being asked. Even at the lower rate it would be necessary for them to get $35 to $40 per ton for freight in order to make any profit.

If the data on charters and rates promised "as soon as we can get at it" and "in a day or so" is received shortly it will be forwarded, though it may be too late for any particular use of the bureau.

The various concerns from whom information is sought will, however, be visited again with hope of results.

E. G. BABBITT, Commercial Agent.

TRANSFER OF MERCHANT VESSELS FROM UNITED STATES TO FOREIGN REGISTRY.

The bill provides that vessels purchased, chartered, or leased from the board may not, without the approval of the board, be transferred to foreign registry or flag or sold. As these vessels will be purchased or constructed with funds furnished by the Government, with the view of increasing the facilities for the extension of our foreign commerce and to provide naval auxiliaries in time of war, they should be under the control of the board, as far as may be necessary to carry out that object. The bill does not place any limitations on the right of the owners of other vessels under the American flag to dispose of them as they please in time of peace. The bill does provide, however, that transfer from American registry to foreign registry when the United States is at war, or during national emergency, shall not be made without the approval of the board.

In the 11 months prior to January 22, 1916, the leading maritime nations, possessing over three-fourths of the world's merchant shipping under foreign flags, have passed laws or issued decrees forbidding their citizens or subjects to sell and transfer to the flag of another nation any merchant ship under their respective flags except by a special permit from the Government. Great Britain enacted such a law on February 12, Austria-Hungary issued such a decree on August 27, Denmark on October 8, Germany enacted such a law on October 21, France on November 11, Norway issued a decree on December 6, Brazil on December 9, and Spain promulgated a law on January 9, 1916. The merchant shipping of these countries aggregates 33,900,000 gross tons, out of a total of 43,370,000 gross tons of all foreign nations. Other nations may promulgate similar laws or decrees for the duration of the war, and notice of such laws or decrees may not be received in this country until after they have taken effect.

The imperative need of the creation of a board vested with powers to regulate common carriers by water is given expression in the following letters from the Chamber of Commerce of Porto Rico:

DECEMBER 8, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We confirm the letter which we had the honor of addressing you on November 19 last, and now take the liberty of inclosing copy of a communication we wrote on the 3d idem to Gen. Frank McIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, Washington, D. C.

We are desirous that you become thoroughly cognizant of the serious injury which the steamship monopoly plying out of here is causing our commerce and the export trade of the United States proper, the last exemplification being an arbitrary increase of 150 per cent on Porto Rico sugar destined to the United States.

In addition to this the steamship companies, and more particularly the New York & Porto Rico Steamship Co., have announced publicly that beginning with January 3, 1916, they purpose making changes in other freights between the United States and Porto Rico. They do not specify the tendency of such changes, but we have received information from private but reliable sources that the same will consist of an increase of 25 to 30 per cent over the already high rates charged.

The most adverse feature from the viewpoint of our trade interests is the fact that having developed a plan—the outgrowth of one year's study and labor—to start our own steamship line at this time, the combine has threatened to wage a relentless and ruinous rate war if we venture to carry our plan into execution.

This is why we feel emboldened to crave the protection of the United States Government, so that our interests may not be left open to the attacks of the steamship monopoly, which, actuated by inordinate greed, seeks to sweep aside all attempts to establish reasonable freights, and why we respectfully petition that a recommendation be made to the Congress to enact legislation regulating the freight rates between Porto Rico and the United States under the supervision of the national Executive.

Such an act of Congress would be the greatest boon that could be conferred upon the trade element and people of Porto Rico, and the chamber of commerce therefore prays that you will interpose your valuable influence to such end.

We ask you, Mr. McAdoo, kindly to pardon our insistence, but you will admit that in order to procure justice it must be sought through the proper channel.

Please accept our thanks in advance for all that you may do in our behalf.

Respectfully,

[SEAL.] CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PORTO RICO,
By B. ZALDUONDO, President.

DECEMBER 3, 1915.

Gen. FRANK MCINTYRE, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Having heard of your return from the Philippines, I gladly avail myself of the present opportunity to convey to you the most respectful and cordial greetings of the above chamber of commerce.

On different occasions we have written Secretary of Commerce Redfield asking him to bear in mind the urgent necessity of recommending to the present Congress the passage of a legislative measure providing for Government regulation of ocean freight rates between this island and the United States. A promise to the desired effect was made by Secretary Redfield to the committee of the undersigned chamber of commerce, which had the honor of calling on him during February last, and we have no doubt that he will comply therewith.

You will remember the complaints which we filed with the said functionary in Washington at that time. Subsequently we have forwarded considerable corroborative evidence anent the inexplicable rise in ocean freights between here and there for want of regulative legislation.

We are now constrained to submit a new datum, which will undoubtedly sway the national administration in our favor and induce the Secretary of Commerce to include in the Government legislative program a measure governing traffic changes as prayed for.

We have reference to the following:

The agencies of the steamship companies which are operating a carrying service between Porto Rico and the United States have received instructions from their respective head offices in New York to charge 30 cents for every 100 pounds of sugar shipped from this island to the United States. The freight charged up to this time is 12 cents, and in corroboration of our statement we are prepared to furnish the United States Government signed contracts entered into by and in the possession of several shippers of sugar, based on a consideration of 12 cents for every 100 pounds.

The island of Porto Rico will produce during the present crop at least 3,000,000 sacks of sugar containing 250 pounds each. Of this output about 2,000,000 sacks will go to the United States. With the freight at 30 cents per 100 pounds, the carriage of each sack will cost 75 cents as against 30 cents paid at present. So that, reckoning the increase of 45 cents a sack on 2,000,000 sacks, we find our trade balance will be reduced by $900,000, which will go to swell the coffers of the monopolizing steamship companies plying out of here, to the grave detriment of this unfortunate island.

This chamber of commerce submits that it is neither equitable nor lawful that ocean carriers should be allowed to raise the freight of a staple product like sugar 150 per cent at 24 hours' notice, and such high procedure on their part is made possible only by the lack of adequate and necessary legislation for the regulation of freights.

The commerce of the United States is safeguarded by the interstate-commerce act, which provides for and creates a commission to enforce the regulation of interstate freights. But Porto Rico, which is included under the coastwise regulations, does not enjoy the benefits of this or any other analogous act, and, on the other hand, is deprived of the advantages accruing to freight carried in foreign bottoms. It is thus left naked to the machinations of the steamship combine which controls our traffic and divested of means to neutralize the disastrous effects resulting therefrom.

In view of the foregoing, this chamber of commerce respectfully and earnestly petitions Gen. McIntyre and the Secretary of Commerce, as well as the other officials of the national administration, to recommend to the present Congress the passage of appropriate legislation authorizing Government regulation of freight rates and of other conditions affecting transportation trade between this island and the United States.

For the past 12 months we have been urgently petitioning your bureau and the Secretary of Commerce to recommend the adoption of such legislation, and we refuse to believe that compliance with our just request will be longer deferred.

You are at liberty to refer this letter to Secretary of Commerce Redfield or to any other Government official, and we respectfully invite and confidently hope for your valuable cooperation in support of the petition of this chamber of commerce in furtherance of the general interests of the island of Porto Rico.

Respectfully,

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PORTO RICO,
By B. ZALDUONDO.

NAVAL RESERVE FORCE.

The committee regard the provision for a naval reserve force of very great importance from the standpoint of national defense.

The officers and crews of vessels listed by the Secretary of the Navy as vessels of the United States naval auxiliary reserve, who volunteer for that purpose, may be enrolled as such naval reserve force under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

This provision is intended to articulate with a provision in a bill which we understand is now being considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, providing for a United States naval auxiliary reserve.

In the event of any public emergency not only the vessels provided for in the bill may be taken over as naval auxiliaries, but provision will be made for crews for such vessels.

THE NEED OF A MERCHANT MARINE IN OUR FOREIGN TRADE.

It is not claimed for this bill that it provides for an adequate merchant marine in the foreign trade. That need will not be adequately supplied until we have not less than seven to ten million tons of shipping under the American flag engaged in the overseas trade. It will take years of intelligently directed effort to provide such a fleet of merchant ships.

If we would provide foreign markets for the surplus of our factories, mines, and farms and would compete on equal terms with foreign nations for such markets we must provide our own transportation facilities. The warehouse and railroad terminals on our seaboards are congested with commodities for export. Ocean freight rates have increased in many cases to a prohibitive degree, and in other cases vessels are not available at even the enormous rates shippers are willing to pay to move their commodities.

WAR LOSSES OF SHIPPING.

The following tabulation is compiled from the report of Commercial Attaché A. H. Baldwin at London from a statement of Mr. Archibald Hurd on the world shipping losses, published in daily Commerce Reports of March 20, and covers losses down to January 22, 1916; and from the report of the French Society of Shipbuilders (Société des Armateurs des France), covering the merchant vessels of belligerent nations held in ports of the world to avoid capture. The heavy tonnage destroyed by submarines, of course, is due to the number of very large passenger ships thus destroyed. The submarine attacks have been very destructive within the past few weeks and the total tonnage destroyed accordingly would probably now equal fully 2,250,000 gross tons. Following is a summary of actual losses up to January 22:

Destroyed or seriously damaged.

	Gross tons.
By submarine torpedoes, 431	1,212,785
By other war causes, 347	915,663
Grand total, 805	2,128,448

Following are condensed statements of the effects of the war upon the shipping of the two belligerent groups and the neutral group of nations:

MERCHANT SHIPS OF THE ALLIES.

On June 30, 1914 (Lloyd's Register), the merchant shipping of the allies comprised the following:

	Number.	Gross tons.
British	11,328	21,045,049
Belgian	182	352,124
French	1,576	2,319,438
Italian	1,160	1,668,296
Japanese	1,103	1,708,386
Russian	1,254	1,053,818
Total	16,603	28,147,111

Merchant ships of the allies in German, Austrian, and Turkish ports number 143, of 225,802 gross tons.

The Germans and Austrians have sunk or seriously damaged by submarine attacks 330 merchant ships of the allies, of 1,065,869 gross tons. German cruisers, mines, and explosions have sunk or seriously damaged 179 merchant ships of the allies, of 495,922 gross tons; total casualties, 509 ships, of 1,561,791 gross tons.

GERMAN AND AUSTRIAN MERCHANT SHIPS.

On June 30, 1914 (Lloyd's Register), the merchant shipping of Germany and Austria-Hungary comprised the following:

	Number.	Gross tons.
Austro-Hungarian	445	1,055,719
German	2,388	5,459,296
Total	2,833	6,515,015

On account of the war German and Austrian ships are now in port to avoid capture, and except to a small extent on the Baltic are not engaged in trade as German ships. Their location is—

	Number.	Gross tons.
In neutral ports	763	2,877,244
In allied ports	627	1,420,236
Total	1,390	4,297,480

A considerable number of those in allied ports are in trade under allied flags, either having been condemned as prizes or being requisitioned by the allied powers.

The allies have sunk very few German and Austrian merchant ships (54 of 124,018 gross tons, not including a few converted commerce destroyers, cruisers, e. g., Cape Trafalgar and Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse).

The remainder, aggregating about 2,000,000 gross tons, are in German or Austrian harbors (no account, of course, is taken of Turkish or Bulgarian merchant ships).

Of the German and Austrian ships lying in neutral ports to avoid risk of capture, 95 such ships, of 628,837 gross tons, are in American ports, and 44, of 217,061 gross tons, in Brazil.

NEUTRAL MERCHANT SHIPS.

On June 30 the merchant shipping of neutral nations numbered 11,400, of 14,427,426 gross tons. Of this number, 101, of 146,916 gross tons, have been sunk or seriously damaged by submarines, and 114, of 295,723 gross tons, sunk or seriously damaged by other war causes. The allied navies have captured 52, of 98,833 gross tons, and the Germany Navy has captured 469, of a tonnage not stated, mainly small vessels in the Baltic and along the German coast. Many neutral vessels captured by both belligerents have been released and some condemned as prizes, but the figures are not at hand.

UNITED STATES VESSELS REGISTERED FOR FOREIGN TRADE AND BUILDING FOR SUCH TRADE.

The number of vessels registered for foreign trade January 1, 1916, was 2,913, of 2,000,778 gross tons.

The number of vessels admitted to American registry under act of August 18, 1914, up to May 8, 1916, was 180 vessels, of 617,183 gross tons.

The number of vessels of all kinds now being built in American shipyards, May 1, 1916, is 363 vessels of about 1,125,000 gross tons. It is not known how many of these vessels will be registered for the foreign trade, but probably more than 50 per cent.

The Washington Post of May 2, in a very able editorial, entitled "The foreign trade suffering for lack of an American merchant marine," reviews the situation in forceful language, from which we quote the following:

"The falling off in value of exports from the United States, as evidenced during the past three weeks, is directly chargeable to lack of available ocean tonnage to transport the freights offered.

"The prolongation of the congestion of freights at our railway terminals is likewise largely owing to the same shortage of vessels.

"The farmers lose in prices of their products through this embargo upon shipments of the grain and other commodities derived from the lands.

"The planters lose by reason of the limitations upon shipments of cotton, sugar, and rice.

"The miners and the mine owners would be doing far better if the vessels could be provided to transport the coal, the iron, the steel, the copper, the zinc, the lead, and other metals and minerals of the United States.

"The merchants, the bankers, and the manufacturers would all be benefited by the placing of additional vessels upon the trade routes over which the foreign trade of the United States is transported.

"The masses of the people, the industrial workers of the skilled and unskilled labor of this Republic, would all be benefited by expansion in volume and value of our exports, and that expansion would be enormous if the country had its merchant marine and the administration firmly demanded and strenuously maintained the freedom of the seas for our commerce.

"The foreign commerce of the United States is contracted, limited, narrowed, compressed, and the administration fails to clear the seas to our flag and our trade and the Congress fails to provide the country with the merchant marine that the Republic absolutely needs, and every Member of the Senate and every Member of the House is fully aware of the injury being done by the want of vessels.

"It is not a partisan question, and yet the country is permitted to suffer by reason of the inaction of certain elements in both of the leading parties.

"Private capital has not provided that marine; it will never provide such a marine as the huge trade of this Nation requires with its own cash. Private capital should be fairly treated, reasonably treated, encouraged by concessions to engage in this establishment of a merchant marine, paid for engaging in, if necessary; but when it receives the cash of the people of the United States for that purpose it should agree to the regulation of routes and rates by the United States Government, through which the people will pay these vessel owners and vessel controllers the cash for serving the people. The central idea, the vital point, that this marine is to be established for the benefit of the great commercial, industrial, and producing interests, for the benefit of the great majority of the people of the United States, should not for one moment be overlooked by the legislators of the Nation.

"The shipping interests are but the means through which these benefits must be made to accrue to the people. They are to be benefited, too, and should be guaranteed from loss while under governmental control of routes and rates, but they should be regarded as public utilities to serve the people of the United States, and when recipients of governmental aid they should be under governmental control of rates and routes."

Recently Admiral Baron Charles Beresford is quoted in the press as calling the attention of the House of Lords to the depletion in the tonnage of British ships needed for trade purposes, asserting that unless it were remedied it would endanger the supply of food, and asking the Government to consult the labor leaders with a view of obtaining more labor for shipbuilding.

In reply Earl Curzon said, "The Government is now administering the whole British mercantile marine amounting to half of the gross tonnage of the world. Forty-three per cent of the British tonnage [he added] has been requisitioned for naval and military purposes. 14 per cent is occupied in carrying foodstuffs and raw material in behalf of the Government and its allies, and the remaining 43 per cent is being operated by British shipowners under State regulations."

In this connection it may be interesting to call attention to an excerpt from the London Economist of November 13, 1915:

"In future the Government may requisition for the carriage of grain and other merchandise any ship registered in the United Kingdom, and after December 1 no British ship of over 500 tons may carry cargo from one foreign port to another without first obtaining a license from a committee in London. All British shipping is liable to be requisitioned for commercial purposes. All trade in British bottoms between foreign ports is to be under direct Government control."

The provisions of the bill creating a Federal shipping board with power to investigate and report to Congress regarding our navigation laws and their effect on the development of our merchant marine, and to have full jurisdiction under the law in all matters pertaining to overseas transportation, including the provisions abolishing deferred rebates, and providing for supervision of rates by such board, with the requirements for filing with the board schedules of rates and all agreements among over-seas commerce, have the approval of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

While this distinguished body of business men favor some form of subsidy or subvention to American shipping in the overseas trade, and particularly subventions to mail lines, such legislation is not pressed at this time for the good and sufficient reason that ocean rates are now almost prohibitive and all vessels at all suitable to our overseas trade are earning enormous dividends on their investments.

Representatives of the National Grange and Farmers Unions appeared before the committee and approved this legislation. The Federation of Labor and seamen's union have by resolutions in national convention approved this legislation.

We believe this bill should speedily be enacted into law, as it will create a shipping board charged with the duty of supervising and fostering our merchant marine. It will provide from 500,000 to 700,000 tons of merchant vessels to serve in the development of our foreign trade; in the event of war, a naval auxiliary manned by a naval auxiliary force. It provides for the reasonable regulation of common carriers by water in foreign and interstate commerce. It has been framed with the view of encouraging, not to discourage, private enterprise in construction and operation of vessels under the American flag. While shipyards are now busy in new construction, we have good reason to believe their facilities will be increased and a new record set in speed and skill in shipbuilding in American shipyards.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendments to section 9.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement the vote is to be taken on the amendments to section 9 and the previous question is considered as ordered. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 154, nays 82, answered "present" 6, not voting 190, as follows:

Mr. ESTOPINAL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GRAHAM. I understand that he did not vote. I therefore withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. ESTOPINAL was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement there is an hour of debate on amendment No. 48. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have amendment No. 48 reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report amendment No. 48.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 36. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refuses or declines to accept or receive freight or cargo in good condition tendered for such port of destination or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, by any citizen of the United States, unless the same is fully laden and has no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle, or unless such freight or cargo consists of merchandise for which such vessel or vehicle is not adaptable.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Are there any amendments pending to this Senate amendment?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand there will be an amendment, and possibly two amendments, offered. There are none pending at the present time.

Mr. CANNON. Amendments are to be offered, to be voted upon?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; they will be offered later and voted upon. Mr. Speaker, as I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], he stated that the Senate amendment now under consideration would not apply to foreign ships as well as to American ships.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I think I was mistaken in regard to my interpretation of the meaning of that amendment. I think it is proper that I should say that. I intended to say it, in view of the criticism that I made of the amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am of opinion that the amendment applies to foreign ships as well as to American ships. The purpose of this amendment is to prevent the blacklisting of American firms engaged in foreign trade, and I am in entire sympathy with it. On the 16th of June, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I incorporated therein the British trading-with-the-enemy act and also the various British orders in council carrying into effect the provisions of that act, as well as a carefully prepared statement showing the effect of that act and the orders in council upon our commerce in the Far East. Hence this is a question to which I have given some thought, and I am deeply interested in having legislation along the line proposed in the Senate amendment No. 48, now under consideration.

The section as drawn is not just in the form that I would have drawn it. Two or three amendments have been suggested, to which I have no substantial objection, but I think it wise for the House to agree to the Senate amendment in the form in which it comes to us because it is late in the session, and to have the bill go back to the Senate again involves delay and we will be compelled to maintain a quorum here from day to day to take further action, if the Senate should not concur in the amendment to the Senate amendment that might better express our views. Therefore, out of an abundance of caution and in the exercise of wise discretion I think we should accept the Senate amendment in the form in which it comes to us.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask my colleague one question in regard to the word "citizen"? Is the gentleman sure where it is tendered by any citizen of the United States that would embrace corporations or associations? Ordinarily that is true. I have some doubt whether by that amendment it would embrace freight tendered by an association or a corporation possibly.

That is in line 7 of page 31.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 1 of the bill defines the term "person" to include corporations, partnerships, and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of the United States, or any State, and so forth, and section 2 provides:

SEC. 2. That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States, and, in the case of geographical divisions of the country. Not more than three of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. No commissioner shall be in the employ of or hold any official relation to any common carrier by water or——

Mr. BURNETT. I think that covers it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Senate amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined to a foreign port, if the vessel undertakes to clear in violation of the terms and conditions imposed thereby. The specific penalty under existing law on a vessel for leaving an American port without a clearance is $500. I called up the Commissioner of Navigation this morning to know if the law in that regard had been violated in the past. He has been Commissioner of Navigation since the early nineties and he said he could not recall a specific instance where the law had been violated by a vessel clearing without papers except recently a Russian ship had left some southern port and the captain after leaving recalled he did not have his clearance papers and returned to the port and secured his papers and then proceeded on his voyage.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. Right in line with that, I think the gentleman agrees with those on this side who have spoken that a provision denying clearance would be a very effective provision?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so.

Mr. BENNET. I agree with the gentleman; and I want to ask the gentleman, in line with the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], if the language on page 31, to which the gentleman from Alabama called the attention of the chairman, is "any citizen of the United States." The definition on page 2, line 19, is—

The term "person."

Now, if the phrase on page 31 read "By any person a citizen of the United States," then it would cover a corporation. As long as the word "person" is left out it does not cover a corporation, does it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it does. I am not sure, but the Federal statutes so defines the word. I think our courts have held that a corporation organized under the laws of the United States is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. BENNET. But under the Sutherland amendment, where the description adheres to the port and not to the citizenship, there would not be any question about it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not; but I think the word "citizen" in the Senate amendment includes corporations, for the reasons already stated.

Mr. BENNET. It is one more reason for adopting the Sutherland amendment, to clear up this doubt.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] had suggested an amendment, and, as I say, if it were not for the delay involved, if it were not for the fact it would compel us to send this bill back to the Senate for further action, if it were an original proposition to be worked out here, I would have no serious objection to such an amendment; but the penalty imposed by this act on a vessel clearing from an American port is a very drastic penalty, because if the vessel should undertake to leave one of our ports without clearance papers and in violation of this act clear, not only the power of the Revenue-Cutter Service but the Navy as well might be invoked to arrest and return that vessel to the port. Such a vessel on the high seas has no standing under maritime law, and no captain, in my opinion, would care to clear from an American port without his papers, and especially in troublous times like these.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. The effect of the Senate amendment would compel the shipowner to accept contraband of war. Does not the gentleman think that requiring the accepting of contraband of war and making the ship liable to capture, for that reason the option should be left to a shipowner whether he would accept contraband of war? Ought he be compelled to accept it and thus put his ship in jeopardy?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Here is the language of the section:

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to refuse clearance to any vessel—

And so forth. The gentleman will see it is not mandatory.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but is it not true that wherever Congress uses the word "authorized" in a case like this it is construed as being directory and not discretionary?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I would think not. I would think it would be discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury in the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the practice of the departments to the contrary?

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Should not the Secretary have discretion? Ought we be compelled to submit to the changing of the contraband list every day or every week, as has been done during the year? Ought we be compelled to submit to the dictation of foreign powers in our own commerce?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think not absolutely.

Mr. HILL. Therefore it ought to be left discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with you, and I think it is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of the Senate amendment.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. HARDY rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield, if to anybody?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to say to the gentleman who last interrogated the gentleman from Missouri that if we should adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia I think it would be directory.

Mr. HILL. I do not know; I just came in. It seems to me it is perfectly unthinkable that this Nation should be subject to the dictation of other nations as to what is contraband and what is not on the mere whim of the moment, without any international agreement in regard to it.

Mr. HARDY. For that very reason, so as to leave discretion, I think the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HILL. I am in favor of anything that will give the United States control of the situation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves 10 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] five minutes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered as a substitute for amendment No. 48, proposed by Mr. SUTHERLAND:

"That from and after the passage of this resolution, and during the existence of a war to which the United States is not a party, and in order to protect the commerce of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized, directed, and empowered to direct any collector of customs to refuse a clearance to any vessel or other vehicle laden with merchandise destined for a foreign or domestic port whenever he shall have satisfactory reason to believe that the master, owner, or other officer of such vessel or other vehicle refuses or declines to accept or receive freight or cargo tendered for such port of destination, or for some intermediate port of call, together with the proper freight or transportation charges therefor, from any port of the United States, unless the same is so declined or refused because such vessel or other vehicle is fully laden and has no space accommodations for the freight or cargo so tendered, due regard being had for the proper loading of such vessel or vehicle, or unless the acceptance of such merchandise will put the vessel or the cargo, or any part thereof, in danger of capture or seizure on the high seas."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, the circumstances calling for the adoption of some measure of this kind are briefly these: That shippers of this country desiring to ship merchandise to ports of South America or other countries, upon applying for space in ships plying to those ports, are frequently at this time being refused the privilege of shipping such merchandise by the agents or owners of vessels, for the sole and only reason that if they take these cargoes or portions of cargoes they are boycotted at various coaling ports and are unable to get coal. It is even stated that at this time a vessel of the United States is practically interned at Bermuda because a portion of its cargo was consigned to a blacklisted firm. It has been denied the privilege of getting coal there at the coaling port, and is thus unable to proceed further on its voyage.

There seems to be no objection to this amendment on the part of the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge, except that it makes a change in the bill as reported back by the conferees, and he is therefore afraid that the passage of the bill might be delayed or endangered. Apparently he concurs in the purpose of this amendment. There is every reason, as he stated, that some definite, even drastic, action should be taken to meet these circumstances, and that action is accomplished by this amendment in providing that unless these vessels take these cargoes or portions of cargoes that are offered to them, the vessels shall not be cleared from our ports. It is almost inconceivable to American citizens that the commerce of this country should be interfered with in this manner by a foreign nation, whether belligerent or not.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I do not see how this bill is going to remedy the situation. If this bill becomes a law, the result of it will be that all of our ships will be tied up in some of these foreign ports. How does the gentleman propose by this bill to compel the British Government to change its orders?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I conferred with some of those connected with the departments having these matters in charge, and the opinion was informally expressed to me that Great Britain or the other countries which would be affected, and which are unwarrantably interfering with legitimate American commerce, realize that there is no statute at this time under which the President of the United States can act. They are as well aware of the limitations of our statutes as we are on this side. It is believed that the mere enactment of legislation with the power given to the President to take immediate and drastic action, as provided by the amendment I have offered, would cause Great Britain and other countries which are guilty of these practices to change their orders in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment I have offered as a substitute for the Thomas amendment differs from the latter in several important particulars, and in my judgment more fully accomplishes the purposes of the Thomas amendment. In the first place it limits the application of the remedy to the period of time only during which a war is in progress to which the United States is not a party. The practices complained of could not conceivably be carried on or endured by this Government or its people during a time of general peace. Its sole justification is that it is a war measure, and we are expected to submit to this and other unjustifiable interferences with our rights under this pretext while our diplomatic protests are unavailing.

In the second place, my amendment is broader in its effect than the Thomas amendment, because it provides that clearance may be denied ships refusing freight offered by any shipper at our ports, and surely those who may not have actually gained citizenship here, but who are doing business in this country under the protection of our laws and our treaties with foreign powers, should receive the same protection in this matter as our own citizens receive.

In the third place, my amendment includes a provision suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey, Judge PARKER, which allows the refusal of freight the carrying of which would subject the vessel to capture on the high seas.

It is alleged, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that our mails enroute to neutral ports have been illegally seized and unreasonably delayed. That vessels that have usually plied directly between ports of this country and the ports of neutral countries have by devious ways been induced or compelled to change their routes so that they now stop at ports of one of the belligerent nations, and are there held to be under the jurisdiction of such nation and the mails carried on them subjected to stoppage and censorship, without warrant of international law.

These practices continue notwithstanding our protests. Particularly is this practice carried on at the ports of Kirkwall and Falmouth, in Great Britain, with reference to vessels carrying mails between this country and Scandinavia and Holland. Shall we allow these practices to continue, or shall we now effectually place in the hands of the executive branch of the Government an instrument which will enable it to stop at once the interference with our commerce, and let us hope that later some effective means may be found to reform the practices now being carried on with reference to our mails?

Is it sufficient for us that it is explained that these freights are declined because the consignee or consignor is blacklisted? Or shall we unhesitatingly protect the rights of every American citizen, whether nearly or remotely of foreign parentage, as well as any who have not become citizens, but who nevertheless are entitled to our protection and consideration as long as they conform to our laws? I hope my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], suppose Great Britan has absolute power to determine what commodities shall be shipped in British ships; we have the power to provide if those vessels come into American ports they shall comply with our laws. Now, for that reason this Senate amendment is intended to prevent an unreasonable exercise of that power by the British Government, and if it is exercised reasonably and within the reasonable laws of trade we will have no right to object.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] five minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill. I do not believe that any of the direful effects will befall this country if it is enacted into law which some have prophesied would happen to us this evening. For 29 years, or nearly so, the Congress of the United States has undertaken to regulate rates upon the railroads. It took a long time to get that proposition down to a solid, intelligent basis, but finally Congress through various laws from time to time enlarging the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission has solved the problem. Down to this time there never has been any regulation of water rates or traffic, and if there was not a single thing in this bill except the establishment of a board and the giving to that board of power to regulate water traffic and transportation, in my opinion, it would be a splendid measure. This bill will never be repealed in its essential provisions, no matter which party gets control of this country, because out of it will eventually come splendid benefits to our people.

Every thoughtful American citizen recognizes that something must be done for our merchant marine. On this proposition there is a unanimity of expression between both of the leading parties in this country to-day. The difference arises as to how it shall be revived. The Democratic Party presents this bill to the country as its method of building up an American merchant marine. I heartily indorse the method pursued by my party. The Republican Party proposes a straight ship subsidy, discredited and discarded by its own party for many years and only revived in the Chicago convention.

Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that this country will never stand for a ship subsidy. It is erroneous in principle, economically unsound in practice. The idea of paying shipowners a tremendous subsidy to haul American mail and American goods to foreign markets and permitting the American shipowner to own the vessel is not in accord with the spirit of the times. We have progressed on beyond that idea. We not only need but we must have a merchant marine to carry our goods to foreign markets. We have reached a point in the production of American goods far beyond American consumption. This year our export trade, consisting of American goods produced in our mines, factories, mills, and on the farms, reached the stupendous figure of six and a half billions of dollars. We are now in a fair way to get the South American trade; in fact, we have got it, and we must hold it. We can only hold it by being prepared to get our goods to South America. We would be derelict in our duty as legislators if we failed to make provision to get our goods to the Republics of South America. Our cities have grown to abnormal size, and the toilers and workers in our cities must keep their jobs; and they can only keep their jobs on condition that we extend our foreign trade, and our foreign trade can only be extended when we have vessels to carry American goods to foreign markets.

The $50,000,000 carried in this bill for buying or constructing American ships is a mere bagatelle as compared to what we should have. But it is a beginning. It is a start, and a good start at that. I am unalterably opposed to the Republican policy of a ship subsidy, because it is unsound in principle. We must have water regulation of rates, and the terms of this bill give to the commissioners power to regulate water rates similar to the power given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix freight rates on railroads. In my opinion and in my judgment, it will meet with universal approval from the masses of the people. It will only be condemned by the owners of vessels on water who heretofore have practically fixed their own rates.

But I want to briefly mention amendment No. 48. This amendment gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to refuse clearance papers for all vessels sailing to foreign ports on refusing to carry American-manufactured goods unless the vessel is loaded at the time the goods are offered. I am heartily in favor of this amendment. I am in favor of any drastic law which will make the nations of the earth realize that the United States is still on the map. [Applause.] The very idea that almost from the time when the first shot rang out in the great European war the Republic of the United States has been doing business "by the grace of King George of England," if you please, is absurd, unbelievable; and yet that is the way we have been doing business since the outbreak of the war.

The American business man from October 1, 1914, down to the present hour has scarcely known from one day to the next what England's contraband list is or what it is going to be the next day; and at last, adding insult to injury, England has deliberately placed a large number of American firms upon a black list, refusing to trade with them, refusing to ship and transport their goods. For one, as an American citizen, I am tired of this brutal force of England. [Applause.] Never since the day that a little band of American citizens dumped English tea overboard from an English ship into the Boston Harbor have American business men done business through the will or by the consent of Great Britain or any other foreign prince, king, or potentate. The American business man until the present time has done business in an honorable, upright way with his foreign competitors without asking the consent of any foreign power.

I sent to the State Department a month ago and got what I supposed was the then list of American firms blacklisted by England. It consisted of eighty-odd different firms in the United States doing business legitimate and lawful under the Stars and Stripes; and whether native born or naturalized citizens of the United States, they at least are doing business on American soil, protected by American treaties with England, and all the other Governments which have blacklisted American firms.

I am not acquainted with any of the firms whose names are blacklisted, but I undertake to say from the names of every firm upon that list, with one exception, they are German firms. One of these firms carries an English name, but every one of the rest of them, without exception, contains a German name. I am not talking for politics at all. I may be saying things that I had better not say. From a political viewpoint, discretion may be the better part of valor, and valor in this instance may suggest to me to keep silent. But when the time comes that any great foreign power undertakes to stigmatize the Germans in this country as being unloyal, unfaithful, unpatriotic, I resent it, and I resent it with all the power and force within me. [Applause.] I live with 9,000 of them in my district, and a more loyal set of men never walked this earth. They are industrious, frugal, and energetic. Their patriotism has never been questioned; they have fought for the flag of our country on every battle field at home or abroad, and they stand ready and willing to do so again should our country ever be assailed by any foreign foe, no matter who it may be.

The English Government has blacklisted, or substantially so, a firm in my own district, because this is the effect of what England is doing to this little firm to-day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts give me three minutes more?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman three minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question there?

Mr. COX. For a brief question; yes.

Mr. SLOAN. What, if anything, has our State Department done to meet this injustice which the gentleman has so emphatically and clearly portrayed?

Mr. COX. I do not know. I can not discuss that; but I am in favor of doing this: I am in favor of giving to the Treasury Department a club, a bludgeon, and then I will risk public opinion in this country to enforce the statute, knowing that if the statute is enforced England will soon be compelled to lift her tyrannical, unlawful, and unwarranted blacklist. [Applause.] I know the concern in my own district personally. I know the men at the head of it. They are unable to get their goods in English vessels and unloaded on English docks, because their goods are on England's blacklist. Why these goods are on the blacklist, I do not know, except as I am informed that the same commodity which is made in my district is made in Germany, and England seems to be laboring under the delusion that these goods are made in Germany when the God's truth is they are made in Floyd County, Ind.

For nearly two years England has seized our mails, opened our letters, refused to let anything in the way of letters or parcel-post matter reach the central powers of Germany and Austria. Our Government has always regarded American mail with a sacredness, so much so that it refuses to permit any of its own citizens to interfere with mail, to prevent its transportation, or in any way to reach its proper destination. Yet patiently the people of our country have waited for nearly two years upon the good will of England to stop the interference with our mails—until patience has almost ceased to be a virtue.

Mr. Speaker, I am a man of peace; I deplore war as few men deplore it; but for one, by the Eternal God, I would send American mail to its proper destination if I had to send it backed and supported by the power of the American Navy. [Applause.] England receded, shortly after the outbreak of the war, from her London declaration of 1909, fixing contraband of war; and how many times she has enlarged this list, from the time the war broke out to this hour, I do not know. She has thrown a wall of mines around the British Isles; she has compelled American vessels to enter her ports for the sake of procuring pilots to safely pilot them through the wall of mines.

In this way she has taken American trade destined absolutely to neutral countries; she has denied the truth of American manifests and thrown American manufactured goods, produced in our mines, factories, and on our farms, into her own ports, condemned them as prizes, or, at her own good will, finally allowed them to reach their destination. This is un-American. How long are we going to submit to this overawing domination of Great Britain? How long is it going to last? How much longer must we crawl upon our hands and knees and crave the indulgence of King George, France, Russia, or any of the other belligerent powers, I care not who they be? [Applause.]

I am for amendment 48, and I am going to vote for any amendment that is offered on the floor of this House by any Member, upon either side of the aisle, that will strengthen it. [Applause.] I have been besieged not to do it. I have been told that if any amendment is agreed to in the bill, that this might defeat it and send it back to conference. Oh, I have heard that old argument before. I have been here entirely too long for that argument to have any terrors for me at all.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. For a question solely.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman want to make this legislation mandatory? Does he not want to leave any discretion anywhere?

Mr. COX. I would absolutely direct the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in this instance, to issue or not issue clearance papers to all vessels leaving American ports for foreign ports exactly as this Congress not a month ago directed the Postmaster General to pay our $2,300,000 to the rural-route carriers of this country. [Applause.] And if we can direct the Postmaster General to do a certain thing, in the name of high heaven, have we not got the right—the moral right—to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue or not to issue clearance papers to vessels leaving American ports? It is only a question, gentlemen, of our having the moral courage to do it. This is the whole thing in a nutshell. If we have the moral courage to write into a law this direction to the Secretary of the Treasury, then let us do it. Let us write into this law a provision that has teeth in it; that means something; that the moment England sees it she will recognize at once that we mean business; that England may recognize that when American goods made in this country, no matter by whom made, reach American ports, that they must go abroad.

I am for this amendment, and for an amendment to it which means something. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am not here to speak for Germans or English or French, or anybody else, but to speak for the United States of America and the rights of American citizens.

If you will look in the RECORD at some remarks that I made the other day, you will find a list of contraband, and that is the vital question in this amendment:

The list comprises all articles which have been declared to be absolute contraband, as well as those declared to be conditional contraband—

I am reading from the proclamation of King George of Great Britain:

The circumstances of the present war are so peculiar that His Majesty's Government consider that for practical purposes the distinction between the two classes of contraband have ceased to have any value.

We had no part or privilege in making that decision. We were not consulted. I read from another proclamation by the King:

April 18, 1916: We do hereby declare, by and with the advice of our privy council, that during the continuance of the war, or until we do give further public notice the following articles will be treated as absolute contraband in addition to those set out in our royal proclamations above mentioned: Gold, silver, paper money, and all negotiable instruments and realizable securities.

There is a great variety of articles specified, and the lists are changed and added to at will.

Is the United States to be left absolutely under the direction of the other nations of the world in paying off its debts to neutral nations? I am for this amendment of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, almost enough so to vote for the whole bill—not quite—but I am going to vote for this amendment just as it is. I would make it stronger if I could. The gentleman here says if we include contraband we will find our ships tied up in the different ports of the world. Let us find them there, and see if there is not backbone enough in this administration to order them released and have them released if they are complying with the laws of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Let me tell you a little incident. I can not mention names. Our own people are terrified to-day, and write to us as Representatives stating conditions, and saying, "Please do not mention my name; it will get me into trouble."

I know a gentleman who for years has had a regular business in a foreign neutral country. A few days ago he got a small order from his agent, who has been his agent for years, and it was approved by the Merchants' Guild, designated and specified by Great Britain as the party to whom merchants in foreign countries should go and get approval so that they may receive shipments from the United States of America. It was approved. It had its number. Now, what happened? The order came forward. The money to pay for it came, and it had the approval of the foreign Merchants' Guild. You would naturally suppose that was enough to allow the American merchant to ship the articles specified therein to a neutral country. But no. When it gets here the merchant has to write to the British Embassy in Washington. The British Embassy writes to the neutral foreign country to verify it, to see whether the American merchant or the foreign purchaser has been making false statements about it. It is six or eight weeks before the answer comes back. When it comes back, then the British Embassy in Washington gives its gracious permit to have $150 worth of American goods shipped to a neutral country to a neutral merchant. How long are we going to submit to this sort of thing? I am for making that amendment just as drastic as it can be made. I am perfectly willing even to leave it to this administration, with all its diplomatic weakness, as I consider it, if I can not get anything better, in the hope that the good Lord some time or other will inspire this administration with a little courage, a little vigor, and a little backbone. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. How does the time stand now, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] has 12 minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has 20 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Missouri use some of his time now?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, this amendment as adopted by the Senate and upon which we are about to vote covers the very difficulty about which a great deal of complaint has been made. It authorizes the refusal of a clearance to any vessel that refuses to carry American goods to any of the ports of the world. In my judgment, that will cure the difficulty, and I think that amendment is proper and will enable difficulties now existing to be overcome.

I think a good many of the statements that have been made about the black list have been overdrawn. I know some of them have. I heard it stated not long ago that our people could not ship goods to South America without the consent of the British ambassador, and that the State Department knew that fact. I immediately went to the State Department and made inquiry as to that matter, and they informed me that they not only knew of nothing of that kind, but had had no information about anything of that kind, and if it existed anywhere they had never heard of it before. Such a thing would be intolerable, and this Government would not permit it. Such unfounded rumors ought not to be circulated, as they do harm and breed discontent.

Here is a bill that is calculated to do more good to the industry of this country than almost any other measure that has been passed in this House.

There is another fact that should not be overlooked. Fifty years ago the shipbuilding industry of this country was one of its leading industries. It flourished and was a great pride, but a change came with high protection and it suffered. It dwindled away until it almost faded out of existence. It was tariff taxed to death. During this administration the duty has been taken off the materials that enter into the building of ships and the industry has by magic sprung up, and has in a short time become one of the great industries of this country. It is assuming its old-time prestige, and thrift and confidence prevails. Now, it will not do for gentlemen upon that side to say that we need a tariff in order to protect the labor engaged in this industry, because higher wages now are paid than ever known. Since these articles have been free of duty the wages of all the employees in our shipyards are higher than they were before, and the business is in a most flourishing condition. The raw materials are on the free list, and the shipbuilding business is enjoying a marvelous prosperity.

We need this bill, and why? We need it for the purpose of reducing the cost of transportation of articles sold abroad in order that we may realize the profits that labor and the producer earn and should have the benefit.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CULLOP. I have only five minutes, and I prefer not to yield.

What is the situation? The price paid for our commodities abroad to-day in foreign lands is the consumer's price. If the transportation charges were reduced one-half, the producer and not the consumer abroad would be the beneficiary of that reduction. Take wheat, corn, and other articles. Gentlemen who are opposing this legislation are standing in the way of prosperity in this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CULLOP. When the European war broke out it cost to ship a bushel of wheat from any Atlantic port in this country to any European port 3 to 6 cents a bushel. Immediately upon the breaking out of the European war the freight rate rose and rose until it went to 46 cents a bushel. What was the result? The producer, not the foreign consumer, lost that amount. Our American producers suffered to that extent, and hence American interests suffered. Gentlemen who oppose this legislation are standing in the way of the prosperity of their own citizens, their own constituents. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I predict that after the passage of this bill we will not have to purchase half a dozen ships. The shipowners who now control these prices and have a monopoly will come down in their charges in order to avoid the competition. We have an example that supports this theory in the passage of the Federal insurance legislation. The same result will follow enactment of this measure. The same gentlemen who oppose this legislation were denouncing that legislation as socialism, competing with our own citizens, the Government driving business away from the individual, and predicting it would bankrupt the Government. But what was the result? With the enactment of the legislation, instead of bankrupting the Government as gentlemen predicted, instead of driving the citizen out of business as gentlemen on that side predicted it would do, the opposite result was had.

The Government went into the insurance business. It has paid all of its liabilities, cleared $100,000 a month for the Government for every month it has been in the business, and it did not drive a single American insurance company out of business, but they came down with their rates to a normal figure. So it will be in this case, and then the manufacturer, the farmer, the producer of this country will realize the profits.

The defeat of the ship bill a year and a half ago cost the producers of this country many, many millions of dollars, and the gentlemen who stood upon this floor denouncing it as socialistic, as injuring the citizen and bankrupting the Government, were injuring the producers of this country, depriving them of profits they were justly entitled to, amounting to millions and millions of dollars. The country suffered because of its failure to pass and enormous losses were sustained. We should see to it now that such a result shall not be repeated. The people now understand its value and all know of its necessity. They know full well the motive which actuates those who are opposing its enactment and they who will be the beneficiaries if they should succeed in their opposition. The Ship Trust patiently hopes for their success. Since the European war broke out the Ship Trust has been reaping a golden harvest at the expense of the American producers, but with the passage of this measure its exploitation of the helpless will end and its opportunity for plunder will cease. It is time for it to end and the people who earn the profits given opportunity to enjoy them. Its enforcement will then open the markets of the world and this Government will be able to say to the world, "Hands off!" and enforce its declarations as to our export business. This Government is not cowering at the feet of any power in the world, and if any foreign power should attempt to limit our commerce it would be promptly resented and would sustain its position at all hazards. No Government would attempt it, because every nation in the world knows both our power and our courage, and none want to incur our displeasure, because of our ability to sustain our position. For political buncombe, a few in their political zeal have attempted to create the impression that some foreign country is dictating the terms upon which we shall conduct our commerce abroad, but the facts do not sustain their contention, but, on the contrary, completely refute them. They hope by their course to arouse race prejudice and gain a temporary political advantage, but they will not accomplish their purpose. This administration is not dominated by any foreign power, and, further, it will not be; and if attempted to do so it would be promptly resented and reprimanded. Let no one be deceived. President Wilson will take care of our American interests and defend American rights and preserve American honor, and every nation on the face of the earth knows and respects it. American prestige in the eyes of the entire world was never as great as it is at this hour, and the people of this country appreciate this fact. He has elevated the standard of Americanism so high that no nation cares to antagonize this country, and all studiously avoid incurring our hostility. The work of this administration excels that of any one that has preceded it, and it redounds to the welfare of the people, which commends it for continuance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to another example of Democratic inconsistency. The gentleman from Indiana has spent eight minutes arguing that the producer in America pays the foreign freight rate and we would have saved so many millions if we had had the shipping bill before. When the gentleman comes to discuss the tariff he says the producer does not pay the tariff, but the consumer does. He is as consistent as the Democrats usually are.

But I want to say a word about the Senate amendment, the purpose of which I am heartily in favor of. In my judgment the language found in the Senate amendment is full of danger, because, according to the uniform practice of all the departments in this Government and the uniform practice of Congress, when a delegation of authority is made it is regarded as mandatory, and not discretionary. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this language is mandatory, it means that every shipowner affected by the amendment will be compelled to accept contraband of war as a part of the freight that he is to carry. If that is true, it comes very near a violation of neutrality on the part of our Government.

Under international law an American citizen has the absolute right to sell contraband of war to whoever he pleases. A shipowner has the absolute right to carry contraband of war, the penalty, and the only penalty, in both cases being the capture and confiscation of the property.

But, Mr. Speaker, the United States Government can not carry contraband of war without violation of its neutrality. If the Government should attempt to carry contraband of war on a Government ship, it would be an absolute violation, and likewise, it seems to me, it would be a violation of neutrality on the part of our Government to compel any shipowner to carry contraband of war. And so, if this is mandatory, it involves a very serious question indeed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The language of the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia does make it mandatory.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment proposed by the gentleman makes it mandatory as to all goods that the Senate amendment does, except such goods as may render the ship liable to capture, and therefore absolutely takes care of the situation, and meets the situation better than the Senate amendment, because it will compel all goods other than contraband of war to be taken by the shipowner.

Mr. BENNET. The additions to the Sutherland amendment are those in the Parker amendment, which the gentleman from Missouri commended a few moments ago, but which he did not know had been added to the Sutherland amendment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I did not understand that it had been added to the Sutherland amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The Sutherland amendment excepts those goods that might be subject to capture.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thought that was stricken out.

Mr. BENNET. No; it is a part of the Sutherland amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. But, Mr. Speaker, aside from that, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] suggested that to compel the carrying of contraband of war might result in tying up the ships in a foreign port, and therefore, instead of being an aid to foreign commerce, might be a detriment. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in reply said that if our ships are tied up in a foreign port because they carry contraband of war, let us find out and see whether there is banckbone enough in this administration to get them out.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. My time is short.

Mr. HILL. Would not the same conditions result if freight was carried to a black-listed person?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to follow out the line I started upon in answer to the gentleman's statement. The gentleman said that we will see whether there is backbone enough in this country to get the ships out. I want to say that if any ship does carry contraband of war, the United States Government is absolutely powerless to get the ships out, because they have the right of capture.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They could carry freight to South America.

Mr. LENROOT. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, let us take a ship four-fifths of the cargo of which is loaded with foodstuffs, and somebody offers a thousand rifles or a hundred cannon to the ship. Is it fair to the shipowner, is it fair to the producer, is it fair to the shipper of foodstuffs, to subject four-fifths of the cargo to detention and capture because of these 1,000 rifles or 100 cannon which are contraband of war?

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I can very well see that to compel every shipowner to carry contraband of war to complete his cargo might well mean an increase of freight rates on goods that are noncontraband of war, because the hazard is so much greater and subjects the ship to capture, whereas if there was no contraband of war he would not be subject to capture or detention at all. So there should either be a discretion clearly reposed in the Secretary of the Treasury or the provisions of the Sutherland amendment should be adopted excepting them.

I want to say a word in reference to the construction of the language. Wherever in any bill, as Members will recollect, the authority is granted to the head of any department to do a thing, if we want to make it discretionary we always—if it is not done in committee we do it on the floor of the House—we always say "authorized within his discretion" to do certain things. If that was done in this case, of course it would clearly make it discretionary; but as it stands, both under the practice of the department and the practice of Congress, it will be regarded as mandatory, compelling them to refuse clearance unless contraband goods are accepted. For the reasons given, I shall heartily support the Sutherland amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, this amendment 48, I think, should be agreed to. I can not conceive how any reasonable objection can be made to it. It is claimed that other Governments discriminate against our commerce in the distribution of their freight space on cargo ships or refusal to carry the freight of our people. This amendment seeks to clothe the Government of the United States with the right to prevent that discrimination whenever they find it is being used to the detriment of our shipping. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] means nothing unless it means to take away from the Government or the executive officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, the discretion which is vested in him by the Senate amendment. It does direct him mandatorily to refuse a clearance to certain vessels that refuse cargo space to American goods, and then it undertakes to exempt certain vessels or accept certain excuses that a vessel owner may give by trying to specify cases in which the vessel owner will have the right to refuse the cargo. In doing that it still further takes away discretion from the Secretary of the Treasury. In my opinion the language of this amendment as it comes from the Senate is precisely right, because it places in the executive department, the Secretary of the Treasury, the right to examine and investigate the actions of foreign Governments, and if he finds that any foreign Government is discriminating against our shippers to the detriment of our trade, then he can refuse clearance to a ship that is so discriminating against our goods. Whenever you undertake to restrict or bind or limit or fix the limit upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury you cripple the arm of the Government that should be used freely for the protection of our industries and our interests.

There is another matter. It does seem to me that everybody who wants to pass this bill and let Congress get away from here should try not to tangle up the situation by any amendment, however slight or unimportant, that would throw this bill in conference and again back into the Senate and again back into the House. This is such a little amendment, with so little, if any, improvement, even if anybody believes it is an improvement, that I believe we ought upon this measure, all of us, Republicans and Democrats, to vote against the proposed amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia and for amendment 48 as it comes from the Senate and get the whole thing into effect for the protection of our commerce against the blacklist and other discriminations at once.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the words "the Secretary of the Treasury" for the words "the President" in my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by substituting for the words "the President" the words "the Secretary of the Treasury." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House is adverse to the best interests of the farmers of the United States. The main proposition is to borrow money for the purpose of buying ships at the highest price that ships ever were held since Noah was a sailor. The ships are expected to transport goods to foreign ports, but the large purpose is to enable those ships to carry farm products from Argentina, Australia, and elsewhere to the ports of the United States and compete thereby with the products of our great farming districts. [Applause on the Republican side.]

At the same time, to further place a burden upon the farmers of the United States, two great committees of the House and Senate are preparing measures that will undoubtedly raise the freight rates of every man who produces a bushel of surplus grain or a pound of surplus animal food products throughout the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The largest temporary fact on earth is the European war. The largest permanent fact conceived and upbuilt by men is the American Republic, with its liberal Government, progress, and present wealth. The largest problem for the statesmen of America and of Europe will be to defend on the one hand and assail on the other the industry, commerce, and wealth of America when the war closes. Europe will endeavor to obtain in her own way that which we should defend in our most effective way.

Raising revenues to meet governmental expense has been for centuries the point about which political controversies have centered. Our Constitution makers in wisely taking to the General Government control of the ports of entry, provided not only the best and most effective means of raising the major part of our revenue, but enabled the Government to prefer, and cause its citizens to prefer, the products of American labor and capital to those produced or used under any other flag.

The primacy of this principle has always been recognized by the political division, under whatever name it has been known, which has been devoted to constructive principles. It has been uniformly opposed by those with a taste for the foreign flavor and texture, and not so deeply concerned about the predominance and permanence of things American.

So a protective tariff, with widely separated exceptions, has been the large issue for nearly a century. It was the large issue in 1912. As a factor in determining the result, it was then seriously affected by the division of the Republican Party. The protective tariff, as carried out in this country, has been applied to products which at the time were, or within a reasonable time would probably become, competitive with like products from other lands. Under this policy, Republicans placed reasonable duties upon farm products in the McKinley bill of 1892. These the Wilson bill of 1894 largely reduced. The Wilson bill, however, retained a substantial duty—generally ad valorem—on nearly all farm products. The Dingley bill of 1897 placed a wholesome protective tariff upon farm products. This tariff was practically reenacted in the Payne law of 1909 and remained until superseded by the Underwood law of October 3, 1913.

Republicans favored protection of farm products for the following reasons:

First. Because they saw in the growth of our population and the rapid reduction to cultivation of our lands, as well as in our annual statistics, an approximation of consumption and production.

Second. Farming is not the simple process it once was to be carried on by anyone, and taken up or dropped at any time. A season, a year, or even a decade will not span or determine agricultural success. Farming is a profession now and ought to be the noblest of them all. It should receive first consideration instead of being made the victim of unwarranted legislative caprice or party venom.

The farmer must combine the training of the engineer to understand and manipulate his complicated machinery, with the study of the scientist, to prepare the soil, seed, harvest, and garner. Moreover, he must be a financier to judge when, how, and under what circumstance to market his products that best results may follow.

Third. The course of tariff legislation in other countries, Britain excepted, has been to place protective duties on farm products. The following table gives some of the duties the American farmer must pay in order to enter his products in foreign countries:

Country.	Fresh meats per pound (about).	Cured or simply prepared meats per pound (about).	Average of cereals per bushel (about).

The following comparisons of imports of 27 leading northern product periods will be interesting from both import and revenue considerations:

First comparison, first nine months, new law, with corresponding months in last year of old law: Old law imports, $49,727,159; new law imports, $130,692,543. Increase, 162 per cent.

Second comparison, first year of new law compared with last corresponding year under the old law: Old law imports, $63,342,993; new law imports, $166,020,946. Increase, 162 per cent.

Third comparison, first 21 months of the new law compared with the last corresponding period of the old law (it will be noted that this period contains 10 months nonwar period and 11 months war period): Old law imports, $132,395,694; new law imports, $273,718,123. Increase, 106 per cent.

Total imports for 21 months under new law compared with last 21 months under old law: Total imports under old law, $2,229,780,348; total imports of foodstuffs and raw wool, $556,533,733, or 24 per cent of the totals; total imports under new law, $3,121,285,761; total imports of foodstuffs and raw wool, $1,003,809,279, or 32 per cent of the total. This shows an increase in imports of $891,505,413, of which food products and raw wool was $447,265,546, or 50 per cent. While the imports of foodstuffs and raw wool increased 80 per cent, the increase of all other products was only 20 per cent.

Free imports: Of the total free imports during the last 21 months of the old law, amounting to $1,215,461,871, 18 per cent, or $228,337,714, were foodstuffs and raw wool. For the first 21 months under the new law the total free imports were $1,927,895,375, of which $557,519,898, or 29 per cent, was foodstuffs and raw wool. This shows an increase of $712,433,504, of which foodstuffs and raw wool furnish $329,182,184, or 46 per cent. While the imports of foodstuffs and raw wool under the free list increased 144 per cent, the increase of all other products on the free list was only 38 per cent.

Revenue: If the old rates had been collected upon the imports of these 27 articles for the first 21 months under the new law the revenue would have amounted to $88,377,974. The amount actually collected for a period of 21 months under the new law was $9,283,577. Now, this is but a part of Schedule G with raw wool added. * * * From these facts and figures the loss of revenue growing out of this discrimination against the farmer totals each year an enormous sum. And if we were to include all of Schedule G, with raw wool added, we must add several millions more.

Selecting 1912 as the last year which was not disturbed by threatening or actual tariff changes, and 1915 as the first clear year under the Underwood law, we find the dutiable agricultural imports of 1912 to be $783,457,471; for 1915, $908,185,128. This shows an increase of $124,727,657. In order to bring in this additional competition the Treasury lost, on the dutiable list, $33,270,720. This is measured by the difference between Schedule G's income in 1912 and 1915, plus the loss on raw wool. In other words, 34 per cent, or more than one-third, of all the losses of revenue suffered under the Underwood law resulted from the changes made in farm-product duties.

It would have been a bold statement in the light of all these facts for the Democratic Party to have declared in favor of placing farm products generally on the free list. Yet fair dealing with the producers of the country required such a platform statement, if legislation such as was afterwards enacted in the Underwood law had then been contemplated. To do less was bad faith. Yet nowhere in the Democratic platform of 1912 was there a hint, to say nothing about an open statement, that the large feature of Democracy's tariff policy, which was given first place in the national platform and in the tariff law which was given first place in the Democratic legislative program, was to be the removal of duty from nearly all farm products produced in the North and drastic reduction of others belonging to that section.

The Democratic national platform said nothing directly about farm products being placed on the free list, nor did it state, leaving anything open to inference, that its legislation would be of that character. The first important clause of its paramount plank was—

> We favor the immediate downward revision of the existing high and in many cases prohibitive tariff duties, insisting that material reductions be speedily made upon the necessities of life.

Speedy reduction of duties can not be tortured by any honest interpretation into meaning a removal of duties. The idea involved in the word "reduction" indicates a lessening, but also implies a continuance in form and substance of the original factor. So farmers may have been warned that duties on farm products would be reduced in case of Democratic success, as had been done in the Wilson bill in 1884, but no one was given to understand or was warranted in understanding that the duties would be removed and farm products generally placed on the free list. The change promised was a matter of diet, not of death.

However, further on the platform states:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

The products of the American farm do not enter into competition with trust-controlled products and have not been sold abroad more cheaply than at home. The wheat, corn, rye, cattle, hogs, sheep, poultry, eggs, potatoes, and other products of the farm are not sold by our farmers in competition with any trust.

The only other provision of the Baltimore platform which related to duties on farm products is where it says:

> We denounce the action of President Taft in vetoing the bills to reduce the tariff in the cotton, woolen, metal, and chemical schedules and the farmers' free-list bill.

It will be recalled that the farmer's free-list bill, as it passed Congress and was presented to President Taft, contained little produced upon the farm. The articles, including meats and cereals, which had been in the free-list bill when originally introduced, had been, by the deliberate action of a Democratic House and a Republican Senate, cut out of that bill. So that all any farmer had reason to fear if fairly dealt with by the successful party was a reduction of the rate of duties upon his products, and he was in nowise warned that any of them would be placed upon the free list.

Judge Cowan, of Texas, a Democrat, speaking before the Ways and Means Committee, during the discussion of the Underwood bill, practically charged the Democratic Party with bad faith in placing live stock and meats on the free list when it had not declared for such policy at Baltimore.

Upon this question the American people, except the Democratic Party, had largely and fairly expressed themselves. The Republican platform adopted at Chicago in 1912 said:

> The products of the farm and of the mine should receive the same measure of protection as other products of American labor.

The Progressive national platform adopted at Chicago in 1912 said:

> We believe in a protective tariff which shall equalize conditions of competition between the United States and foreign countries, both for the farmer and the manufacturer, and which shall maintain for labor an adequate standard of living.

There were cast in support of these platforms for unsuccessful presidential candidates 7,604,518 votes. There were cast for the successful minority candidate for President only 6,293,454 votes. There were lacking 1,311,064 votes of a majority. And, moreover, of all candidates for the House of Representatives in the Sixty-third Congress the expression of the voters on this great subject of legislation, if carried into effect, would have elected 211 Democrats and 224 Members favoring reasonable protection to the products of farm, factory, and mine.

Further, the two great agricultural organizations of this country have not been silent on this subject. The National Grange, speaking upon this subject, said:

> We confirm the position of the grange upon the tariff question as passed by the forty-second session of the National Grange, namely, "That whatever the policy of the Government may be, the farmers of the United States demand that, as far as possible, such measures of direct benefit therefrom as is given to manufacturers or any other industries of the country shall also be accorded to agriculture."

The Farmers' National Congress, in its last formal deliverance on this subject, said:

> A fair and equal measure accorded to all industries of the country needing protection. Any legislative discrimination will be opposed by our influence and resented by our votes. We will never submit to selling in a free-trade market and buying in a protected market.

Upon the other hand, no farmers' organization has demanded free or substantially free trade in farm products.

Schedule G, with the rest of the bill, was sent to a Democratic caucus of House Members, dominated by cotton and Tammany. When a northern Member simply attempted to protest in the name of the farmers of the North, he was browbeaten into silence. He was told to take his choice, silence and patronage, or protest and disfavor. One was told that the active postmasters he might name would exert more influence than the 20,000 farmer voters in his district. He chose the postmasters. A Republican successor now sits in his stead. In the 1914 congressional election the Republicans gained 36 agricultural districts.

The largest feature of the Underwood tariff bill was its slaughter of farmers' protection, as the following facts will establish:

First. It affected the large group of all citizens, who, according to our census estimates, are divided as follows:

Agriculture and animal husbandry	12,500,000
Manufacturing and mechanical industry	10,500,000
Domestic and personal service	3,800,000
Trade	3,500,000
Transportation	2,700,000
Clerical service	1,700,000
Professions	1,600,000
Minerals	900,000

Second. It threw open to competition the largest portion of our country's annual production of wealth with the rapidly increasing products of other agricultural countries, including the great pastures and developing lands in Canada, South America, Australia, and Africa. So the largest factor of competition created by the Underwood law was against the farmers in their right to the home market, which they had been for decades upbuilding. Indeed, the remarkable prophecy contained in the report signed by the 14 Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee in support of the Underwood bill seemed to apply to agriculture, our greatest industry. Over their signatures these men said: "In our judgment, the future growth of our great industries lies beyond the seas."

Republicans believe that the future growth of our great industries, as well as our lesser ones, should lie between the great seas, Atlantic and Pacific.

COMPARISON OF IMPORTS—1914 WITH 1912.

The fiscal year of 1914 contains three months of the Payne law and nine months of the Underwood law.

There was an increase on all imports over 1912 of $270,889,052. Of these $140,789,052 were farm products; all others, $130,099,907. Stated in percentages, farm products, 52 per cent; all others, 48 per cent.

There was an increase in all exports in 1914 over 1912 of $159,364,197. Of this, $63,346,504 only was farm products and $96,017,693 all others. Stated in percentages, farm products, 40 per cent; all others, 60 per cent. In other words, the farmers were forced to meet $140,789,052 increased import competition in exchange for the advantage of $63,346,504 export. Or, stated in percentages, the farmer was forced to accept a 52 per cent increase of imports competition for a 40 per cent increase of exports of his production, while the others were given the benefit of the $96,017,693 export increase for $130,099,907 import increase. In the matter of the increase caused by the new law the farmer found the balance against him of $77,442,548, while all others had a balance of trade increase against them of only $34,082,214.

The following are some of the important transfers from the Underwood dutiable to the free list in the Underwood law:

Cattle, sheep, wool, beef, mutton, corn, eggs, milk, cream, potatoes, and wheat—wheat and potatoes to bear 10 cents per bushel and 10 per cent, respectively, if the importing countries charge a duty for our shipment to them.

The following are articles upon which duties were radically reduced:

Horses, poultry, oats, hay, cheese, and butter.

The remaining rate yields considerable revenue but extends little protection.

When the tariff bill was under way the Ways and Means Committee, to silence the protest of the farmers and the northern Congressmen, set forth in its report a statement, claimed to be based on legitimate Treasury information, showing probable importations during the first year's operation under the proposed law:

	Forecast for year.	Actual imports for first year.	Ratio of estimate to actual imports.
Cattle	$5,570,000	$21,006,690.58	1 to 4
Horses	612,500	1,804,818.50	1 to 3
Eggs	210,000	1,582,490.63	1 to 7½
Butter	325,000	1,907,145.20	1 to 6
Oats	945,000	8,059,743.43	1 to 8½

In scriptural times false prophets were stoned. In Democratic times they send them to the United States Senate. Whither UNDERWOOD of Alabama, and JAMES of Kentucky, have gone. There have been no similar advances by northern Democratic Members of the Ways and Means Committee.

The increase of imports of 27 northern agricultural products during the first nine months of the Underwood tariff as compared with the last nine months of the Payne tariff was from $49,853,631 to $129,280,817, or 159 per cent.

Third. To inflict upon the farmers of the North the burden of competition from cheap lands, cheap labor, and cheap ocean transportation, the Democratic Congress discriminated against the northern farmer and in favor of the southern agriculturist.

(a) Rice flourishes only in Dixie. The Underwood law retained it on the protected list, while wheat, raised in the North—except under conditions—was placed on the free list.

(b) Tobacco, largely produced in the South, is protected, while corn is free.

(c) Peanuts of Virginia and North Carolina were retained on the protected list while potatoes of Maine and Northern States generally were placed on the free list. This had led a great many northern farmers to believe that the Underwood law is a shell game throughout.

(d) Angora goat hair of Texas and the Southwest generally is protected. Wool of the North is free listed. It would seem that this was an effort to see how far they could go in sectional discrimination. They reversed the Scripture to do it. According to Matthew, the sacred writer, on the final day the sheep were to be placed on the right for protection; the goats to be pressed aside upon the left for free trade, or, of course, its equivalent. The Underwood law reverses these positions. And the goat is exalted, while the sheep, during the ages regarded as an emblem of purity and innocence, is rejected. Simply another illustration of how, regardless of whatever cost, the northern farmer must be punished.

SPECIAL PRODUCTS.

The citrus-fruit industry, under the fostering influence of a reasonable protective tariff, was rapidly becoming a great national industry. The Underwood law removed a large measure of that protection. It was urged that the reduction was in the interest of the consumer, but it appears from pending litigation that the beneficiaries are not the consumers but are certain lobbyists in this country and the foreign exporters.

Wheat: The present foreign war has created a great demand for our wheat, and present prices are not being complained of. However, the day of peace and commercial reckoning is coming. Farmers are interested in and remember conditions as they were two years ago, when the Underwood law was in force and the war had not begun. A Democratic Congressman on the floor of the House on June 4, 1914, said:

Wheat now is a better price under Democratic times than it was in 1912 under Republican rule.

The same Member having later, on the 27th of June, said, "Farm products are commanding a high price, the best ever known," a Republican Congressman, in the course of debate, submitted the following facts and figures:

Cash price of wheat at certain markets.

NOTE.—Prices are on No. 2 hard, except Minneapolis prices are No. 2 Northern.
Average decrease in five markets, 18 cents per bushel.

If these dates are regarded as too narrow, if the gentleman desired to give facts concerning prices, he could have resorted to a broader field, using the records of the United States Department of Agriculture. The wheat farm prices quoted are for January, February, March, April, May, and June of the several years. I place them in two groups—one for the years 1914 and 1913 in one group and the other for the four preceding years. I group 1913 and 1914 together because the anticipatory effects of one go with the actual results of the other.

The average price for the first group of four years under the old tariff was for January 93.3. It was 78.6 for the other. For February it was 95 for the four-year group, 80 for the two-year group. March it was 96.2 as compared with 83, and so on, with an average between these two groups of years, covering fairly all of the six months, of 16 cents per bushel in favor of the former law. So that a man desiring to find the truth could not have been easily mistaken, as the following table will show:

If market prices are not fully convincing, allow me to submit the following table, showing the farm prices for small grains during the first six months of the last six years, grouped as heretofore, and the decrease in price for the last two years, compared with the four years previous.

Farm price of certain small grains, first of each month, for the United States for years 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, and average for these four years, as compared with the price for same months for 1913 and 1914, and the average for these two years:

Should we see fit to consider May the month preceding the gentleman's statement, the following table of important farm products for 1912 and 1914 will be of interest:

May.	1914	1913	Decrease.
Corn, bushel	$0.721	$0.794	$0.073

Flaxseed, bushel	1.347	1.81	.463

All the foregoing information was available to the gentleman at the time he made his statements. It may, however, be of interest to submit a table showing the wheat prices of a recent date compared with two years ago:

Cash wheat prices on certain markets.

	July 11, 1912.	July 11, 1914.	Decrease.

The fall of price in wheat during the last two years has been more than 15 cents per bushel. The difference in average price between the period including 1913 and 1914 and the period of four years preceding is in excess of 15 cents a bushel. The difference in price between June 1, 1914, and the average price for a period of five years preceding that date is 15 cents a bushel. The reduction of the tariff in the Underwood bill was 25 cents per bushel for those countries that receive our wheat free and 15 cents a bushel for the products of countries which do not admit our wheat free. The importation of wheat for the first eight months of the Underwood law increased 357 per cent over those of the corresponding period one year before. It may be interesting to know the effect in dollars and cents to the average wheat farmer of the country, the several States, and the different counties in my congressional district what a fall in price of 15 cents a bushel means.

In considering the relative prices of wheat and other grains during the last two years it is entirely proper to call attention to the fact that prices of farm implements used in securing these crops be given. Upon the authority of the Hon. C. B. Dempster, of Beatrice, Nebr., president of the leading farm-machinery factory west of the Mississippi River, I can state that there has been an advance of price to the retailer during the 12 months preceding June 1 of this year of wagons, plows, disk harrows, grain drills, and so forth. There has been a tendency to advance in price windmills, pumps, and similar farm appliances. I give, however, in detail, the prices quoted and obtained by the International Harvester Co. for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914, the same being based f. o. b. cars Chicago, Ill.

It will be interesting further to know the course of prices of binding twine during the last three years which the farmer must use in taking care of his crop. It has increased, as will appear from the following table of prices quoted by the International Harvester Co.:

	Sisal.	Standard sisal.	Manila.	Pure manila.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents
1912	7¼	7¼	8¼	9¾
1913	9½	9½	11¼	12¾

Is it any wonder that the farmer, pressed between the upper millstone of falling wheat prices and the lower stone of rising machinery and binding twine prices, has little patience with statements at variance with well-known market facts? The farmers know that the majority party so drafted its recent tariff law as to make them bear its burdens and suffer from its injuries. They resent the gratuitous insult in the assumption that farmers do not remember back a period of two years, and that they do not know their own markets. Free-trade statesmen will learn that farmers' memories are in working order while their forgetters are decayed and rusting. As ex-President Roosevelt well said:

> As for the farmer, the present tariff, the administration's tariff, was so framed as to result in the sacrifice of his interests. He had no spokesman, no friend in high quarters, and his welfare was contemptuously sacrificed. At every point where his interest was concerned he was made to suffer.

Corn: Corn and wheat are the two leading cereals, and also the two leading farm products in the United States. They demonstrate in their decreasing exports and increasing imports, the rapid approximation or consumption and production. The markets illustrate the large advantage foreign producers have who carry the products of their land l water to our great seaboard cities, while our producers must pay a much larger transportation rate over the railroads from the interior of the United States when there is a surplus of production; that is, Argentina, which now exports more corn than all other countries of the world, the United States included, after the passage of the Underwood law, was shipping enormous amounts of corn from her ports to our eastern ports, at transportation rates of from 3 to 5 cents a bushel.

The following is a statement of the railway rates paid for corn shipments from the leading western markets to the seaboard cities:

From—	To— Boston.	New York.	Philadelphia.	Baltimore.	Galveston.	New Orleans.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
Omaha	0.18	0.17	0.16	0.15	0.19	0.11
Kansas City	.17	.16	.15	.14	.17	.10
Chicago	.10	.08	.07	.07	.18	.10

If to each of these rates there would be added the additional rate which it would cost to carry the corn from the local station to one of these western markets, the very large advantage given by the Underwood law to the Argentine corn producer will be apparent. If to this advantage we add the further facts that Argentine land, averaging in productivity well with our grain belt, varies in selling value from one-fourth to one-half of our American land, and as our farm laborers receive twice the wages of the Argentinian, the northern grain producer can well understand the great disadvantage under which he labors, with the tariff taken off corn.

The average annual amount of corn shipped between the various nations of the earth for 10 years before 1914 has been 245,557,706 bushels. It is about 38 per cent of the international shipmen of wheat. The following is the rank of nations in corn production:

United States, Argentina, Mexico, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Roumania, Italy, and Africa.

And the following is a list of the important corn-exporting nations in the order of their rank:

Argentina, United States, Roumania, Russia, Bulgaria, Belgium, and the Netherlands.

The following table shows the course of exports of the two leading nations for 10 years:

1914	139,461,000	17,022,000

The following shows the rapidly decreasing export of corn and wheat from this country:

The Payne rate of tariff on corn was 15 cents a bushel. During the first nine months in which the Underwood law was in force, prior to the outbreak of the European war, there were 11,843,166 bushels of corn imported into this country, nearly all from Argentina.

At the hearings held by a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, on the subject of grain grading, at which there were leading grain men from the great grain markets in every part of the United States, the question was asked of a number what effect the removal of the duty on corn had on the corn price during that period. The invariable answer was that it reduced the price, and the average reduction was about 10 cents a bushel. No grain man there present either doubted or gainsaid the statement. We quote from Mr. Gorman, a large grain dealer of Toledo:

Now, take an illustration to-day. I am out of business on corn in the old channels in which I was trading up to six months ago, for the reason that the pressure of Argentine corn in all the consuming sections, from Florida to Maine, has driven me out. Now, all that is taken away from us, because the grain is headed here from Argentina, and the consumer realizes that he can buy Argentine corn cheaper than he can buy mine, and he realizes the enormous quantity which he can get; and therefore he buys from hand to mouth, and in his buying from hand to mouth he depresses the price of corn in this country, and in consequence of that competition corn has declined 10 cents a bushel; it has declined in the future market.

Mr. Paddock said:

If it had not been for the importation of Argentine corn, I think the farmers would have realized 10 cents per bushel above the present price of corn on account of its coming.

Beef: All fresh meats were placed upon the free list by the Underwood law. While the Payne law was in force Argentina shipped some beef into the United States. Her fresh meats were then shipped largely to the free ports of Britain. Argentina practically drove American meats out of British markets, as will appear from the following table:

Under the Underwood law our seaboard markets became reduced to the same free-trade basis, so far as producers were concerned, as were London and Liverpool. There was shipped into this country, during the first nine months of the Underwood law, 176,333,072 pounds of beef and veal, largely from Argentina, and 12,690,924 pounds of mutton and lamb, largely from Australia. An increase of over sixteenfold over the corresponding preceding year under the Payne law.

Cattle: There was a fair protective tariff on cattle and other meat-producing animals under the Payne law, which was removed by the Underwood law. While Argentina and the other South American countries have enormous surpluses of live stock, as do also the several divisions of Australasia, yet large shipments of live stock have not come to us from these countries because the equatorial belt must be crossed in shipment. The shipments must be reduced to the form of beef and mutton. However, live stock in great numbers have been shipped into this country from Mexico and Canada since the passage of the Underwood Act. We removed the Payne duty from live stock. The Mexicans, under their shrewd, though disreputable rulers, especially in the northern part, immediately placed an export duty on live stock leaving Mexico and coming into the United States, slightly less in rate than our former duty. One million five hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and thirty-seven cattle, between the passage of the Underwood law and the 1st day of June, 1916, have come into our country, so far as our Treasury was concerned, absolutely free. The duty which we should have collected thereon would have amounted to about $9,000,000. The large portion of this instead of coming into the Treasury of the United States went into the girdle of Villa or the war chest of Carranza. In either case it was probably used to purchase munitions of war shipped into that country from America, which were used to terrorize and slaughter Americans there resident, and weapons to use in attacking American citizens on American soil, under the American flag, and against our soldiers whether on American or Mexican soil. To what extent of folly and tragedy Democracy has gone in order to carry out and make effective at whatever the cost, this unwarranted assault upon agriculture, America's greatest industry! That it has dared was due to the belief that farmers can not on account of their isolation organize to defend or protect their rights.

In the Democratic platform adopted at St. Louis this year this remarkable statement was made:

We recognize that tariff rates are necessarily subject to change to meet changing conditions in the world's production and trade. The events of the last two years have brought about many momentous changes. In some respects the effects are yet conjectural and wait to be disclosed.

The tariff conditions affecting farm products are not conjectural; they are established; and no reasonable person could have anticipated a different state of affairs following the passage of the Underwood law.

In recent legislation in Congress the Democratic Party has clumsily recognized the protective principle in favoring a much higher duty on dyestuffs. That party has utterly abandoned its former opposition to a tariff commission and its oft-repeated declaration that protection was unconstitutional. It is favoring the establishment of a tariff commission. Moreover, it further admits its long-persisted-in error by improvising an unwieldy protective device known as the "antidumping clause," thereby committing itself to the protective principle. But while the antidumping clause is of doubtful utility as to any industries, care is taken that it shall not apply to the products of the farm. The principal remedy which it provides is the doubling of the tariff where products are dumped upon our shores at unreasonably low prices. The farmers' products being in the main on the free list, a doubling of the duty would be a vain thing. If the rate is nothing, doubling it would not be a severe penalty, because—

A thousand naughts are not a feather
When in a sum they all are brought together.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

So Democracy, grudgingly yielding up its free-trade and tariff-for-revenue-only policy, and conceding most reluctantly the protection principle, which it has denounced for so many years, now in extremis so forms and shapes its bungling protective device that it can not be availed of by the farmer.

At the close of the Franco-Prussian War the two greatest statesmen of Europe were Bismarck, of Germany, and Gladstone, of Britain. Both were free traders. Gladstone persisted in his free-trade policies, and succeeding prime ministers have, until recently, followed him. The result has been that in the recent struggle Britain found herself dependent for many articles, including foodstuffs, entirely upon foreign and distant fields. Had she not had the greatest navy in the world, her people would have been starved before December 1, 1914. Bismarck, however, looking toward the various strained conditions and crises which might meet his Government, was, from the close of the Franco-Prussian War, convinced that German independence depended primarily upon its capacity to produce nearly enough foodstuffs for all her people. So a policy of protection on German industries, and especially her agriculture was inaugurated. Her limited territory, in the course of a few decades, became the marvel of the world for food production. During the present great struggle, while the great army of Germany and the immense navy of England have been centers of world admiration, the great outstanding fact is, Germany, though girdled by a band of steel, yet has capacity to feed and clothe her citizens and her army.

America should protect every product of its farm, mine, and factory which are brought into competition with the world or whose products we may need in our day of trial. So that American markets may, within reason, be markets for the American producer. No phase of American industry should in the years to come show lack of proper preparedness. [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. SLOAN to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] with some interest. It was in the Sixty-first or Sixty-second Congress, I believe, that William Howard Taft, Republican President of the United States, proposed the reciprocity treaty with Canada putting all farm products on the free list. I also represent an agricultural district, one of the greatest in the United States, as well as the gentleman from Nebraska, but I am not going to hamper or destroy our foreign trade by nourishing the fear that from some quarter of the globe farm products may find entry into an American port in competition with the farmers of the West. I never have had any use for that old policy of the high protectionists that would build a Chinese wall around our own country and shut out all foreign competition. And I am not a free trader nor a protectionist either, but I am just as loyal to American industry, whether it is agricultural, mining, or manufacturing, as any man on that side of the House. I am, however, a good deal like Gen. Scott, who is quoted as having said, in answer to the charge of some of the Whigs that he was not a good Whig, that he was a Whig all right, but that he was not a fool Whig. [Laughter.] And that is my attitude toward American industry. I want to safeguard it in every rational way. Now, we need to develop our commerce with South America. There does not seem to be any division of opinion about that among men who have given thought to the question. The great commercial interests, the great manufacturing interests of our country are insisting that we need an outlet for their surplus in the Orient, in Europe, in all quarters of the globe where we may find a market for the surplus of our farms, our factories, or our mines; and, in my opinion, it is the plain duty of the Congress to facilitate the development of our foreign commerce in every reasonable way. When this war in Europe began only 8 per cent of our foreign commerce was carried in ships under the American flag. That is a reproach to us as a Nation. It is a reproach to the statesmanship of our country, and I would relieve that situation.

Instead I would have at least 60 per cent of our foreign commerce carried under the American flag. I think this legislation will promote that result. The establishment of the shipping board, the large powers vested in that board to investigate and recommend to Congress legislation that will promote this end, should certainly appeal to every reasonable man. Now, as regards the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], I think it ought not to be adopted because it does in express terms make it mandatory on the Secretary of the Treasury in all instances to compel vessels to accept cargo without regard to the character of the cargo. I think there should be discretion vested somewhere and in some one to decide when clearance may or may not be granted. The Senate amendment states that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to deny clearances to ships, whether domestic or foreign, proposing to leave our ports. It clearly lodges discretion in the Secretary. I think that is a wise discretion, and while it may be true, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] contends, that ordinarily this language is usually construed by the department as mandatory, yet there is no warrant in law for doing so. There may be conditions arise where to enforce this provision in all cases, and as to all kinds of cargo tendered, without exception might lead to serious international complications; and hence I think it is wise on our part to leave the Senate amendment as it is with the discretion lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury to decide each case as it arises on its own facts.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman think it proper for the Congress of the United States to disregard our treaties with belligerent nations, as the Senate amendment does, and apply this language merely to citizens of the United States and omit firms which are doing business in our country under treaties and entitled to as much protection as our own citizens? That is what the Senate amendment does.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment proposed does not change the Senate amendment in that regard.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, yes; the amendment proposed covers goods "shipped from American ports." The Senate amendment simply covers goods shipped "by citizens of the United States." In other words, we propose to make our treaties scraps of paper, and I am opposed to it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We do not, in my opinion, because we lodge in the Secretary of the Treasury that wise discretion by which he may avoid the results that the gentleman from New York has in mind.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, no; only to citizens of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I do not think the gentleman's construction is correct. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the Senate amendment and amendments thereto.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Indiana suggested an amendment, and we would not need the previous question.

Mr. COX. I am not going to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Sutherland amendment to Senate amendment numbered 48.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BENNET. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 59.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand, the vote now is being taken on the Sutherland amendment to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is what the Chair stated.

Mr. MANN. What is the motion—to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes; to concur in Senate amendment numbered 48 with the Sutherland amendment.

Mr. MANN. Would it be fair to ask to have the amendment reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendment numbered 48 and then the Sutherland amendment to Senate amendment numbered 48, without objection.

There was no objection.

Senate amendment No. 48 and the Sutherland amendment were again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in amendment No. 48 with the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 94, nays 150, answered "present" 7, not voting 181, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, on the first roll call of the day, on the first amendment voted on, I inadvertently voted, forgetting for the moment that I was paired with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I voted "aye." I desire to withdraw that vote.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to concur in Senate amendment No. 48.

The motion to concur in Senate amendment 48 was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

STATUARY GROUP, HOUSE WING OF CAPITOL (H. DOC. NO. 1354).

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document the proceedings on the occasion of the unveiling of the statuary group on the pediment of the House wing of the Capitol, with illustrations, as may be prepared by the Committee on the Library, 36,000 copies, of which 2,500 copies shall go to the Speaker, 3,500 copies to the Committee on the Library, and 30,000 copies to the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the proceedings incident to the dedication of the pediment on the House wing of the Capitol be printed in document form, 36,000 copies, with illustrations, 2,500 to go to the Speaker, 3,500 to go to the Committee on the Library, and 30,000 to go to the folding room.

Mr. MANN. Twenty-five hundred to go to the Speaker, who made a speech, and 3,500 to the Committee on the Library, which was also interested, and 30,000 to the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the shipping question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the shipping question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON AND BALLS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, and move to insist on the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. How long does the gentleman expect it will take?

Mr. DENT. I do not suppose it will take any time at all.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 6625) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] moves that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. FIELDS, Mr. CALDWELL, and Mr. GREENE of Vermont.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and move to agree to the conference asked by the Senate. I ask that the conference report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1182).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 58, 108, 354, 355, 356, 359, and 361 to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

ROBERT N. PAGE,
JAS. MCANDREWS,
C. R. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
JOS. T. ROBINSON,
J. H. GALLINGER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, before making a motion touching any of these amendments, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this report comes back to the House. The previous report of the conferees and the statement were published in the RECORD of August 18, and the report of the conferees, as far as we had agreed, was adopted. The amendments, as read by number by the Clerk at the desk, were then in disagreement, and after another conference we come back still unable to agree with the Senate conferees on those amendments.

Some of those amendments, Mr. Speaker, that were inserted in the bill by the Senate were not disagreed to by the House conferees because they were opposed to them, but for other reasons. There has come to be a very considerable sentiment, not only among Members of Congress but in the city of Washington, that the present District appropriation bill will not be enacted into law.

At this time, as at several former sessions of Congress, the principal difference between the House and the Senate is on amendment numbered 1, the House passing the bill and undertaking to change the fiscal policy between the Treasury and the District of Columbia. The House will remember that at the last session of Congress, in the enactment of the last appropriation bill, when there was a disagreement upon this particular matter just at the end of the session of Congress, on motion of the then leader of the majority in this House, Mr. UNDERWOOD, a resolution was adopted appointing a commission, a special committee, to take under consideration the fiscal policy existing between the Treasury and the District of Columbia and to report. That committee, after a very full hearing, made a report to the House in January of this year in which they recommended the discontinuance of the policy of half-and-half between the Treasury and the District of Columbia.

I had hoped that this would end the controversy, and that we might inaugurate a new policy that, in my judgment and in the judgment of many gentlemen in this House, would insure in the future a greater progress and development of the District of Columbia, the National Capital, and, at the same time, not impose any additional burdens upon those who reside here.

Mr. Speaker, I am not willing to assume the responsibility for the failure of this bill. This fight that has been started for a change of fiscal policy will go on, and, as right has always triumphed in the long run, in the end it will win. But, as I was saying, I am not willing that the high schools and all progress and development, even for 12 months, in the city of Washington should be retarded and stopped because of the disagreement between the two Houses on this matter.

The Senate has inserted in this bill an amendment which provides for a tax upon intangible personal property. At the proper time I shall move to concur in that amendment.

I believe that practically every Member of this House, if he was as fully acquainted with the circumstances as he possibly might be, as some of us are, would vote for the adoption of this amendment placed in the bill by the Senate. It has become rather notorious that the population of the city of Washington is being increased to some degree at least by a class of gentlemen whose property is in intangible form, who are moving to this jurisdiction to escape taxation upon their holdings. Only yesterday I had a statement made to me that one gentleman had made the statement that by moving to this jurisdiction he had saved $20,000 annually in taxes, because intangible property was not taxed in this jurisdiction. I believe that this perfectly fair tax, placed upon citizens in practically every other jurisdiction in this country, should be written into the law as it affects the District of Columbia; and believing that this House will concur in that Senate amendment, and that this bill with that in it should become a law, and not desiring with my colleagues on the conference committee to assume the responsibility for the failure of this bill to become a law, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment No. 1, which is the half-and-half amendment, and concur in Senate amendment No. 1.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and concur in the same. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the enacting clause strike out the following:

"That hereafter all appropriations made for the support of the government of the District of Columbia, including all sums appropriated in any general appropriation act indicated to be paid out of the District of Columbia revenues except amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said District, shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that the same shall be sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"The following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, namely."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That one half of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, namely."

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the disagreement of the House to Senate amendment No. 1, and concurring in the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the Houses further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 58.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from North Carolina please tell the House what that amendment is?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. This amendment is for the payment of the claim of Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller.

Mr. MANN. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it without objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(58) Damages and payment for ground on account of condemnation proceedings: To pay Thomas W. and Alice N. Keller for ground taken and damages on account of condemnation proceedings in square No. 2838, in the city of Washington, $4,140.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to this amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further disagree to amendment 108 on page 46, which amendment was placed in the bill by the Senate, and which allows voluntary services on school playgrounds. I will say to the House in this connection that the Senate is ready to recede from this amendment. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement.

Mr. MANN. If Congress will not make an appropriation to take care of the playgrounds, why should we not permit voluntary services?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this amendment is in connection with the school playgrounds, and that since this amendment was placed in the bill it has been ascertained that the law already allows school playgrounds to receive voluntary contributions and help, and therefore this amendment does not mean anything.

Mr. MANN. Is this amendment confined to school playgrounds?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It was so intended; yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how it was intended. What does it say?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The Clerk can report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. There was some controversy in Washington this year, on the ground that the appropriation made did not provide for services in the playgrounds. Now it seems to me that when we have playgrounds, and we do not provide the necessary supervisory help, we ought not to kick if somebody will furnish the money to hire somebody to do it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the provision in this bill, if it is enacted into law, practically carries the recommendations made by the authorities, for the playgrounds of the District of Columbia. If the gentleman will allow me, the language of this amendment would have turned over the playgrounds of the city of Washington to the board of education, which is not intended at all. There is a superintendent of playgrounds, and it would have practically legislated her out of office, and disorganized the playground force in the District, and placed them entirely under the board of education.

Mr. MANN. Of course I recognize the futility of any proposition in the House which would legislate somebody out of office.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If they ought not to be legislated out of office, I will agree with the gentleman, and I think in this instance they ought not to be.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. When the District bill was before the House I offered an amendment making an appropriation to care for the playgrounds. This amendment was not adopted; but in reading the conference report the other day rather hurriedly I gained the impression that the conferees had agreed to an amendment on the part of the Senate making a small appropriation for that purpose. Is that true?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will try to find it.

Mr. MONDELL. I was under the impression that such an amendment had been agreed to, and that therefore there was no objection to striking this out.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Amendment No. 109, on page 47 of the Senate bill, increased the amount which the House voted. The bill as it passed the House carried $7,500. The Senate increased it to $10,000, and the House receded. That was for the construction of two swimming pools and shower baths and appurtenances and equipments, on sites to be selected by the commissioners.

Mr. MONDELL. In addition to that, does the gentleman say that it is now the law that voluntary services may be accepted?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. On the school playgrounds; yes; to which this amendment was directed. That is already the law.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further disagree to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House further insists on its disagreement to the Senate amendment 108.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, amendments 354 and 355, on pages 126 and 127 of the bill, make an arbitrary price for gas to consumers in the District of Columbia at 75 cents. I move that the House recede from its disagreement and concur in the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House recede from its disagreement to amendments 354 and 355 and agree to the same.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. We created not a great while ago a public-utilities commission in the District, consisting of the District Commissioners. I do not now recall just what, if any, authority they have over rates for gas.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think in the utilities act passed in 1912 the Utilities Commission was given the power to make a physical examination of all public utilities in the District of Columbia, which includes, of course, the gas companies, with a view of fixing the rate, and I agree with what I think is in the gentleman's mind, that we might have possessed our souls in patience a little while and found out what recommendations were going to be made by the Utilities Commission touching the price of gas.

Mr. MANN. Did not the Utilities Commission have authority themselves to fix the price of gas after they had made the investigation?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I am not quite sure; but I am inclined to think that they did have the authority.

Mr. MANN. As I recall, we have appropriated at different times considerable sums of money to the Utilities Commission to make this investigation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We have appropriated, first and last, something like $160,000, and they have made the investigation, and, I am informed, are practically ready to report within a few months the result of the investigation.

Mr. MANN. So, for fear they have found out something which will give information, we propose to act without any information.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I think the gentleman's statement is possibly a little too emphatic, but still true.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether it is not true that for a number of years past the gas companies have been furnishing gas for the District government for 75 cents a thousand feet?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; such amount as has been furnished has been at 75 cents, under a provision placed in an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. I suppose if we should require them to furnish it at 50 cents they would do it.

Mr. BORLAND. No; they would not.

Mr. MANN. I imagine that they would.

Mr. BORLAND. They would not if that was a confiscation of their property.

Mr. MANN. We could require them to do it; they are under a law that we passed; but that has nothing to do with what is a reasonable charge for gas. We require lots of people to furnish things cheaper to the Government than they furnish them to other people.

Mr. BORLAND. We could not compel them to furnish gas below the cost of production, for that would be a confiscation of their property.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the membership of the House that personally I believe that it would have been vastly better if this amendment had not been placed in the bill and we had waited for investigation and action by the Utilities Commission as to what was a fair price based upon the facts. But since it has been placed in the bill in another body, and unquestionably would pass by a vote in this body, I am making the motion that we recede from our disagreement and concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. I know nothing about the manufacture of gas in the District of Columbia and not much elsewhere. I know in Chicago it is claimed that, owing to the increase in the cost of oil, the cost of the manufacture of gas has been greatly enhanced, and I know that the gas company in Chicago that furnishes a very large amount of gas has recently been compelled, so they say, to reduce their dividends because of that fact. I do not know whether that is the reason, but they have reduced the dividends, claiming that the cost of the manufacture of gas there—it may be manufactured by a different process than here; I do not know about that—has been very considerably increased in the last year or two because they use more or less oil. I do not know whether that is true here or not. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have no information. I was relying on the Utilities Commission to give us that information.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. By this action do we undertake by legislation to fix the price of gas at 75 cents?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That is the specific thing we are doing.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In other words, we fix it by a legislative rather than by an administrative agency after due investigation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We fix it arbitrarily by these amendments at 75 cents, in face of the fact that in 1912 Congress created a Utilities Commission for the specific purpose of ascertaining the physical valuation of all public utilities, with a view of fixing the price to consumers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman think it wiser and more practical that the Utilities Commission should fix this price than that it should be done by the political, the legislative, branch of the Government?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do; that is my judgment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can anybody foresee what will be the price of gas if there should be a prolonged strike? What would be the result if coal could not be obtained or its supply greatly diminished?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It would look like we could not get any gas.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why, then, should we fix a hard and fast price at 75 cents, however desirable and practicable that might be under normal conditions?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The fixing of rates is a legislative function, is it not?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will not controvert that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Can the legislature delegate to a commission authority to exercise a purely legislative function?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will say that I do not know, but in the passage of the act I have alluded to we undertook to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, to authorize them to fix the rate?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; respecting public utilities in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from North Carolina will yield, that was thrashed out long ago. We had the matter up in regard to railroad rates, and we laid down the rule that they must be reasonable, and then the commission determines upon the facts what is reasonable and thereby fixes the rate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The commission decides that such and such a rate is unfair or improper, but can the Interstate Commerce Commission fix the rate? It does not fix it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; it has actually made rates.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say experience in the city of New York and in California has demonstrated that this is undoubtedly the correct way to fix the gas rates. In the Consolidated Gas Co. case in New York, which was tried for so many years, we found that the only way that you could fix a rate in a municipality was through legislative action, and that you could not depend upon any other kind of a body of men to bring the people the justice to which they were entitled. In that particular case the gas company raised the point that they could not make a fair return upon their invested capital, and the Supreme Court of the United States in giving its decision provided the means by which a future decision could be made if it was found that in the future the dividends were not declared in the quantity to which they were entitled. The gas company in the District of Columbia will be amply protected. If it can not earn a reasonable dividend upon the value of its property, including the going value, the reasonable value, the expense and the cost of reproduction, together with what they call the good will of the company, then they will be entitled to set aside any rate that we make. If, on the other hand, by reduction of the price of gas they increase their output to that extent that they can make this same dividend or a reasonable dividend, then they must submit to the price that we fix; and I hope that this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know much about the manufacture of gas except in this Chamber, and that is partly from experience, partly from observance, and partly from performance. [Laughter.] I do not know who manufactures the gas in the District of Columbia. My recollection is that at one time the McLean estate had something to do with it, and that somebody from Cincinnati at some time tried to punish the McLean estate because he did not like the way they did politics; but it seems to me a most remarkable proposition that Congress should provide for a commission to investigate the cost of the manufacture of gas and the value of the plant which manufactures the gas, with a view to fixing the proper rate to be charged, and then, having expended a large amount of money upon this commission, after the commission have acquired the information in the main but before it is submitted to Congress we should in our wisdom determine, without knowledge, something as to which we have directed the acquirement of knowledge for our benefit. That is a remarkable performance; or it would be if it were not a Democratic Congress. No one expects much intelligent operation or action from a Democratic Congress, and we do not often get it. But think of the proposition——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. This gas amendment was offered in the Senate by a member of the gentleman's own party, Senator NORRIS, and it was agreed to by the votes of his own party colleagues in that body. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is referring now to what took place in the Senate. Neither Senator NORRIS nor the Republicans in the Senate have the power to put legislation into effect in the Democratic Congress. What are you trying to do—hide behind a Republican, with a Democratic majority?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Then do not play the baby act. Your are responsible for the legislation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We do not try to evade it.

Mr. MANN. Yes, you do; that is exactly what the gentleman was trying to do——

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One at a time.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is my time—by saying it was proposed by a Republican. I do not care by whom it was proposed. The question is what Congress shall do, not what some Senator or Member of the House shall propose. You can not hide behind that. It is a Democratic Congress which in the face of intelligence, ready to be given to it, determines to act without intelligence—as usual, along Democratic lines.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will now give me a word, I did not undertake to escape the responsibility for the party in power for this amendment or for this legislation. I merely was trying to keep the gentleman from Illinois from escaping such responsibility as belongs to gentlemen upon his side of the aisle for this action with us, and if the gentleman prefers that that be demonstrated, we could very soon ascertain whether or not we are alone responsible for this amendment by having a roll call. As one Democrat personally I agree with the gentleman that it would have been vastly better if the Utilities Commission had been allowed to finish its work and to make a recommendation or to make a rate based upon facts, but at the same time I believe with a great many other gentlemen in this House that being here in the shape this amendment is, it would not be wise now to not enact it into law.

Mr. FITZGERALD rose.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am not so much annoyed because Congress is not waiting for the report of this public-service commission in order to afford some relief to the people of the District of Columbia. There are some things that a man ascertains after he has been in Washington a number of years without waiting for the report of a very expensive commission. Of course, my good friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] after his long experience in Washington, may not have accumulated much new information unless some one furnishes it to him, after a very great expenditure of money. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The progressive Members of Congress on this side of the House keep abreast of the times, keep abreast of modern information, and they know what is going on in Washington, although my friend from Illinois may not.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the gentleman from New York can learn what is going on anywhere unless he learns it in New York City. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, the gentleman does not know how I obtained my information, because I am one of those who studiously refrain from seeking information from the gentleman from Illinois. That is why my information is not incorrect at any time and is always accurate upon public questions, because I go to sources where the information is correct. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Now, anyone who knows anything about the manufacture of gas—and I am not surprised the gentleman from Illinois disclaims knowledge; men who are the most voluminous manufacturers of some commodities profess to have the least information about them [applause on the Democratic side]—but anybody who has general information about the manufacture of gas, or has kept track of court proceedings which have been brought by gas companies and studied legislation fixing the price of gas, knows, if he has any intelligence whatever, that in a municipality like Washington, with all its surrounding circumstances, that 75 cents is not an unreasonable price to fix for gas, and that is established here by the fact that can not be controverted. For a number of years Congress has fixed the price to be paid for gas furnished to the Government by the local companies at the rate of 75 cents.

If that were a confiscatory rate or if it were an unreasonable rate, the gas companies long since would have resorted to the courts to have that rate upset, and wherever a great public-service corporation acquiesces in a regulation fixing the price of its commodity without resorting to the courts, it is very conclusive evidence that the rate is not at all disastrous or unfair to that corporation. Now, if we are to continue to wait and wait and wait until one of these bodies makes its report to another body and that body makes up its mind as to what relief should be afforded to the people, then the people of Washington, who have no vote, can not participate in this campaign, will continue to be mulcted by a public-service corporation. Now, I admit that a Democratic Congress is doing just a little different from Republican Congresses. It is exercising its own intelligence, it is taking advantage of information it possesses, and despite the fact our Republican friends are standing still or retrograding—I am not certain which, because they go backwards a little and advance a trifle—in spite of that fact, and their opposition to this progressive, humane, remedial, and beneficial legislation, I insist, without attempting to shirk responsibility, or without inviting anyone to share responsibility, we will attempt to give relief to the people of the District of Columbia so that they may enjoy this great era of prosperity to the full that all the other people of the United States are enjoying under a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that all——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] controls the time.

Mr. HOPWOOD. By unanimous consent I would desire to have two or three minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman if he desires it.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I was going to inquire as to how this gas is made, whether of oil or coal. If it is made of coal, I happen to come from a soft-coal region of the country from which much gas coal is shipped, and I know that the price of that coal has increased within the last six months or a year from 50 to 75 per cent over and above the price which then prevailed, and I was wondering whether it would not be possible by some legislation here we might inflict a very great hardship upon these people who produce the gas at the present price of coal. I do not know whether you have examined into that matter. Some of you seem to know exactly what it costs to make gas. I do not know at all what it costs to make it, but I do know that the underlying product that is used in making gas is very expensive at this time, so that it may be that you are putting a confiscatory price upon those people who manufacture gas by putting the gas at 75 cents per thousand cubic feet with coal at the present prices. It seems to me you ought to go slowly in this matter in fixing the price and you ought to have information exactly and accurately at this particular time, not information a year old or 2 years old, but information up to the minute before we fix the specific price which these people are to charge. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to recede from the disagreement of the House to amendments 354 and 355 and concur in the same.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, now I move that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment numbered 316 and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to recede from the House's disagreement to amendment numbered 316 and to concur in the amendment.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this amendment relates to amendment numbered 1, and is made entirely unnecessary, because we have concurred in Senate amendment numbered 1.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment ought to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That all fees, assessments, rents, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. I do not care to have the amendment reported.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 359 and concur in the same. It is just merely a section number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 359 and concur in the same.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Now, Mr. Speaker, the only remaining amendment is the tax on intangible securities—amendment No. 361. I move that we recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 361 and concur with an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk report the Senate amendment for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Section 6 of the act of July 1, 1902, "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding, after paragraph 2 of said section:

"That the moneys and credits, including moneys loaned and invested, bonds and shares of stock (except the stock of banks and other corporations within the District of Columbia the taxation of which banks and corporations is herein provided for) of any person, firm, association, or corporation resident or engaged in business within said District shall be scheduled and appraised in the manner provided by paragraph 1 of said section 6 for listing and appraisal of tangible personal property, and assessed at their fair cash value, and as taxes on said moneys and credits there shall be paid to the tax collector of said District fourtenths of 1 per cent of the value thereof: Provided, That a joint committee consisting of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate and the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives is hereby appointed to make by subcommittee or otherwise a careful and exhaustive study of the tax laws of the District of Columbia, including license taxes, with a view of recommending such changes in the laws as the joint committee may deem fair and equitable, report to be made to the Congress during the next session.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will also report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "thereof," in line 19, on page 131, insert: "Provided, That savings deposits of individuals in a sum not in excess of $500 deposited in banks, trust companies, or building associations, subject to notice of withdrawal and not subject to check, shall be exempt from this tax."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to recede from the House disagreement to amendment No. 361 and to concur in the same with the amendment which has just been reported.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk suggests to the Chair that on page 131, in line 19, after the word "Provided," the word "further" should be inserted.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I overlooked that. After the second word "Provided" the word "further" should be inserted.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make correction of a wrong reference to line and page.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky, the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from North Carolina, and the gentleman from Illinois ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEDMAN, for seven days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CAMPBELL, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. GRIFFIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17645, the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general deficiency bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with general debate on the bill. I have no requests for such debate.

Mr. CANNON. I have none.

Mr. MANN. That can be dispensed with in committee, if no one wants to debate.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I have any demands for time upon this bill. I have no desire to take time myself. I can say all I wish to under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman wants time, there will be no trouble about that. I suppose it is possible there will be some little discussion in regard to some of the items. If there is any desire for general debate, we can make an agreement.

Mr. CANNON. I have no requests from the committee or anybody else for time. I have no desire for much time myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent to dispense with general debate on the deficiency bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the general deficiency bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17645, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No money appropriated by this or any other act for salaries or compensation in any executive department or other Government establishment at the seat of Government shall be available for the payment of any person promoted after March 31, 1917, to a higher salary, unless there shall have been established in such department or independent establishment and be in operation a system of efficiency ratings required by the act of August 23, 1912 (37 Stats., p. 413), as amended by the act of February 28, 1916.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that paragraph. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] desires to make a statement about it, I will reserve the point of order until he has made the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The purpose of this provision is to compel the establishment of a system of efficiency ratings in all the departments of the Government.

Congress, in 1912, enacted a law requiring a system of efficiency ratings to be established and promotions to be based upon such ratings. Since the law was enacted the system has been established in the Post Office Department and in some of the bureaus of the Treasury Department and the State Department has about completed the investigation and determined upon the character of the system it will initiate.

Mr. MANN. Well, in establishing this system of ratings, do not the departments call on the Bureau of Efficiency for help?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some do; yes. I do not know that they have all done so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does know that if they all did it at once they could not get service at once. Now, they propose by this, because some department does not do what the law directs them to do, to punish, not the department, but some clerk in the department who is entitled to a promotion. It does not seem to me that that is the proper man to punish. The proper man to punish is the head of the department, appointed by the President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The idea is to ascertain the fitness of the person entitled to promotion and to prevent the one not entitled to it from getting it.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how that does it at all. Here is a law providing that they shall establish these efficiency ratings. I suppose they will carry out the law in time. But here is a head of a department in this city. His salary will not be reduced. He gets his $12,000 per, no matter what he does, so long as he holds the office. Now, when some one dies or resigns and makes a vacancy, that vacancy is entitled to be filled by some one below. Under this provision you can not make a promotion to the vacancy that is open for the subordinate because of the sins of the superior. I think the sins of the subordinate may sometimes be visited properly upon the superior who has charge of the work, but I never could see the justice of punishing the subordinate for the sins of his superior officer, and unless there is more to be said on it than the gentleman from New York has said I am going to make a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all I have to say. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, then, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York concede that it is subject to a point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The section will be stricken out, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the methods of transacting the public business in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and prepare recommendations for the improvement thereof and submit the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as early as practicable for his approval. Until otherwise provided by law the Bureau of Efficiency shall continue to occupy its present quarters and rooms 316, 319, and 321 in the Winder Building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the language in the last paragraph—on the following language:

Until otherwise provided by law, the Bureau of Efficiency shall continue to occupy its present quarters, the rooms 316, 319, and 321 of the Winder Building.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can entertain only one point of order at a time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us know what the point of order will be. If there is going to be a point of order on it I want to make a statement.

Mr. MANN. I want to make a point of order on the paragraph. There is no amendment in order pending, unless it is being read for information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I propose to offer an amendment to strike out the portion that turns over to the Bureau of Efficiency rooms 316, 319, and 321. Those rooms are occupied by the Auditor for the War Department. The other rooms are now occupied by the Bureau of Efficiency, and should be retained by them. They should not be displaced.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And in view of the legislation that has taken place increasing the work that has been put upon the Auditor for the War Department, they should not be dislodged from the rooms they are now occupying.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is going to strike out that provision of the bill that would take certain rooms away from the auditor and transfer them to the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. Why is it necessary to say by law that the Efficiency Bureau shall occupy its present quarters?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because at present they are installed there. They have no appropriation for rent. They are not in control of the building. If it is desired to make their work stop entirely, all that it is necessary to do is to eject them from their quarters, and then they will have no place in which to operate. Unless some provision is made for quarters for them, you might as well abolish all provision for them.

Mr. RUBEY. They have their quarters there now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. It might be desired by the Secretary of the Treasury or some one else to put them somewhere else, and then it would require an act of Congress to transfer them to some other building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will take care of them until the next session of Congress. This place was fitted up especially to meet the requirements of those persons. They have their records there and their files, and it is admirably adapted to their work.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not object to their staying there, but under this, if you put them in there, you can not take them away until Congress acts. I do not think you should put them there by an act of Congress.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. They were temporarily placed in the rooms they now occupy, because at that time those rooms were not used. Now the Treasury needs the rooms in the Treasury Building for the Farm Loan Bureau.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are going to give them $10,000 to take care of that.

Mr. LOBECK. But you have not done it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have an amendment, which, through oversight, was not printed in the bill. Provision will be made, unless somebody intervenes, by which they will be permitted to use $10,000 to rent quarters for offices now in the Treasury Building, so as to put the Farm Loan Bureau in that building. There will be no necessity of putting anybody from there in the Winder Building. These people should not be disturbed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of my colleague to the fact that the Government owns the Winder Building, and it is perfectly proper for Congress to say what portions of it shall be occupied by such bureaus, and nothing precludes Congress in a subsequent appropriation bill or other piece of legislation from making any change that is necessary. The only thing that must be taken care of at this time is that the Efficiency Bureau must have some quarters. It is occupying these quarters at the present time.

Mr. RUBEY. Suppose these words were stricken out, what effect would it have? Would not the Bureau of Efficiency go on occupying these quarters?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether they would or not. They have been notified that they would be dislodged.

Mr. BORLAND. They would be subject to the views of the custodian of that building.

Mr. LOBECK. They would be subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. RUBEY. They would be subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury and no one else. I understand there is no desire to displace them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand there is a desire to displace them.

Mr. RUBEY. I do not think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know better.

Mr. LOBECK. They wanted to get more room that belonged to the Auditor for the War Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They wanted more room. They needed additional space, but that was not the chief thing. They wanted to be let alone in the quarters which they now occupy.

Mr. LOBECK. They went in there by permission of the Secretary of the Treasury, temporarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of the Treasury is not concerned in housing bureaus which are not under him. Congress fixes the location of every independent and governmental service in buildings. This is nothing new or extraordinary, for Congress to determine where a bureau shall be housed.

Mr. LOBECK. Is not the Secretary of the Treasury concerned in the buildings that belong to and are under the control of the Treasury, so that he can use them for the convenience of the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not under the control of the Treasury. Congress has made provision for certain bureaus of the Treasury Department in the Winder Building. Now, it is proposed to make provision in that building for an independent bureau. The building is not the property of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LOBECK. It is under the control of the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are attempting to prevent these continued indefensible charges for rent for quarters in Washington; but any time that anybody seems to think he is going to lose a foot of space, he stirs up a row in the House for fear somebody else may be provided with quarters without expense to the public.

Mr. RUBEY. How long has that bureau occupied these quarters?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Ever since it was established.

Mr. RUBEY How long is that?

Mr FITZGERALD. Several years.

Mr. RUBEY They could occupy these quarters without this legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether they could or not. They have been notified that these rooms are desired for other purposes. There is no appropriation for it, and it depends on the whim of the head of some other department. Of course, if a department does not wish them to continue their work, which is the most beneficial work that is being done in the interest of economy, they will be put out of business, because they can not conduct their business with their offices in their hats.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist on his point of order?

Mr. RUBEY. I insist on the point of order to the words:

Until otherwise provided by law the Bureau of Efficiency shall continue to occupy its present quarters, and rooms 316, 319, and 321 in the Winder Building.

Mr. ALLEN. I make the point of order to the whole paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order to the entire paragraph.

Mr. ALLEN. I will reserve it if the gentleman from New York wishes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to have the gentleman reserve it.

Mr. ALLEN. I will reserve it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The balance of the paragraph provides that the Bureau of Efficiency, which was created by Congress for the purpose of ascertaining how modern methods of business could be installed in the Government service, shall investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I regret very much that the gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order against it. It is conceded by those in charge of the Bureau of Internal Revenue that its methods are antiquated and that it is organized in a manner which does not produce the most efficient service for the Government. Mr. Brown, of the Bureau of Efficiency, made the statement that after a cursory examination of the Bureau of Internal Revenue he had suggested to the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of that service that by the introduction of improved methods the services of 50 employees could be dispensed with. A difference arose between the Assistant Secretary in charge of that service and the men engaged in this work. The result was that they were not permitted to continue their investigation. Since that time their differences have been adjusted, but in view of the fact that this bureau would be able to effect economy and to save the public money, the committee put in this provision directing it to make the investigation.

Why is this objection raised? It is raised because the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury takes this provision as a personal affront to himself. He believes that it is a reflection upon him that Congress should direct a bureau created by Congress, and made independent of every other department of the Government, to investigate any particular bureau or department of the Government. It seems that a committee consisting of employees in the bureau itself has been engaged in an investigation, and because the Committee on Appropriations desires to have an independent and impartial investigation with a provision that the recommendations shall be submitted to the head of the Treasury Department for his approval—because we have the temerity to recommend such legislation, an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury takes that as a personal affront and spends his time running round this House trying to persuade some Member to make a point of order to prevent such an investigation. I believe that assistant secretaries ought to mind their own business and not interfere with the House or the Members who are desiring not to serve any personal or selfish ends, but simply to bring about the introduction of methods that will make the public service efficient. I regret that some Member has been found who is willing to yield to the importunities of department officials and to prevent legislation of such a beneficial character. [Applause.]

It is time, Mr. Chairman, that the House of Representatives asserted its prerogatives and took a firm stand for legislation necessary to control the public purse of the Government. [Applause.] I am tired of having administrative officials become indignant or offended because Congress dares or presumes to exercise some of its prerogatives, unless the chairman of the committee runs, hat in hand, to the head of the department and begs permission to make regulations for the improvement of the public service. It ought to be stopped and stopped now. This is the time to emphasize the necessity for it. Anybody who believes that any administration will curtail the expenditures of public money indulges in a dream. It is true under every administration during which I have served.

I want to say now, so that the officials of the departments will know it, that they will not advance the things they are interested in by attempting to thwart this House in an effort to improve the public service. [Applause.] Before this bill passes the House will have a demonstration of the power of the House to exercise some of its prerogatives, so that it will express its will without executive interference. Officials who run around threatening or coercing Members, or making promises that can not be carried out, are going to have their hands full, not only in this but in other sessions of Congress, in efforts to attend to the things which they are appointed to do. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not foreclose others from speaking and making known their position.

Mr. ALLEN. I had intended to make the point of order immediately, but I knew the gentleman from New York wanted to say something——

Mr. STAFFORD. And others want to speak, and I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order after he gets through.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have seen or talked with no Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. I did not know that I would create so much excitement in the mind of the gentleman from New York by making the point of order to the paragraph that is clearly not within the rule. It is new legislation. But in addition to that they have a committee now working in the Internal Revenue Bureau that has been engaged there for some time. It has about reached a conclusion. The Bureau of Efficiency has all it can do for the next year in the work already laid out. If this committee of the Treasury Department that is now engaged in straightening out matters in the Bureau of Internal Revenue has not completed its work by December 1, this paragraph can be included in the next appropriation bill, which will be ready long before the Bureau of Efficiency can reach the bureau. I do not believe in double work of this character. Expenditure of time is the same as the expenditure of money. We have one committee doing the work and doing it well, and for that reason I make the point of order. I will reserve it, however, for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, no division of the Government has met with as much opposition and buffeting as this Bureau of Efficiency. The legislative subcommittee recognizing that it was even hamstrung by the Civil Service Commission in its efforts to work reform in the various departments of this Government, made it in the legislative bill a separate and independent organization. It inaugurated reforms and established business methods in the office of the Treasurer in the Treasury Department that saved $60,000 in salaries in one year. The Bureau of Efficiency attempted to install modern business methods in the Bureau of Pensions, but it was thwarted. The Treasury Department officials knew of the work the Bureau of Efficiency was doing in the Treasurer's office and set about to prevent the extension of modern business methods by creating a subterfuge known as the committee on improvement, merely selecting a committee from the respective divisions in their own department to determine whether or not improvements should be installed in the respective divisions. These officials in the respective divisions are not experts and are not qualified as they are in the Bureau of Efficiency to suggest efficiency systems and methods. Since we have created this as a distinct bureau, we wish it to inspect the division of the internal revenue, which can profit more by modern methods than any other bureau of the Treasury Department by using time tabulating devices and recording machines by which there will be a saving to the Government of many thousands of dollars annually.

This Bureau of Efficiency since 1912 has made a distinct saving of $1,000,000 to the Government by installing modern business methods in a few bureaus. And yet we find men pleading for delay, pretending that by means of the various bureaus' own committees, which have not the slightest acquaintance with modern business methods, that efficient methods will be adopted.

We want the Bureau of Efficiency to go through all the departments. I am surprised that any person without having any acquaintance with the conditions which have been presented to the Appropriations Committee should arise here and object by a point of order to a provision that will save the Government, perhaps in this bureau alone, $100,000 a year. That is the responsibility that the gentleman takes who makes a point of order against this Bureau of Efficiency going into the Bureau of Internal Revenue and trying to establish modern, up-to-date business methods. It is upon the gentleman raising the point of order to be charged with that responsibility. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to follow line 11, page 3.

After line 11, page 3, insert the following:

"The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the methods of transacting the public business in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and prepare recommendations for the improvement thereof, and submit the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as early as practicable for his approval. Until otherwise provided by law the Bureau of Efficiency shall continue to occupy its present quarters.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this is the same provision which appeared in the bill except the part which took certain rooms from the Auditor of the War Department and added them to the quarters of the Efficiency Bureau. I am familiar with the work of the Auditor of the War Department, enough so to know that it would not be convenient or practicable to take those rooms, although I have had no communication with him upon the subject. I know that the Bureau of Efficiency is located in the Winder Building, and it is not true, as gentlemen here seem to apprehend, that their remaining there will in any way embarrass the Farm Loan Board. There is no proposition to put the Farm Loan Board in the Winder Building, and if gentlemen have that impression and feel that they are fighting the battle of the Farm Loan Board, they are mistaken in that point. Before I say that, I want to say, however, that no one is more in sympathy with providing quarters for the Farm Loan Board than I am. This bill contains an extra appropriation of $100,000 for the work of organization of that board, in addition to what was provided by the law passed only a few weeks ago, so that this Congress and this committee are not only in sympathy with the work of the Farm Loan Board but they have actually increased the money available for that board by $100,000, in anticipation of expenses they may be put to for temporary quarters or temporary services or otherwise. The Farm Loan Board is amply taken care of in this bill. That just simply reduces this debate to the proposition of whether the Efficiency Bureau, which has thoroughly demonstrated its ability to secure economy and efficiency in the public service, shall be put at the mercy of departmental chiefs or heads of departments who may not be in sympathy with the particular line of work that it is doing or proposed to do at the particular time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman makes the statement that there is an appropriation of $100,000 here for the Farm Loan Board, and he makes the further statement that we some time ago, in the farm-loan act, made an appropriation of $100,000. I know the gentleman wants to be correct, and I am asking him for information myself. Does not the farm-loan act authorize the expenditure of the $100,000—in other words, it is an authorization—and is not this an appropriation in this act, and hence there is no double appropriation of $100,000, as I understand it?

Mr. BORLAND. The Clerk informs me that I am correct about that. This is an additional $100,000 over what was authorized.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is an appropriation of $200,000 for the Farm Loan Board?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wanted information upon that myself.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. This makes available—and I am reenforced by information of the Clerk—$200,000 for the organization of the Farm Loan Board. That leaves simply the question as to the position and independence of this Efficiency Bureau.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. My recollection of that particular matter is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] proposed an amendment to the farm-loan bill which simply authorizes the expenditure of $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a direct appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. BORLAND. And this is another appropriation.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] who has made the point that this matter interferes with the Farm Loan Board. I have not heard any such point made.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the point was made incidentally in the discussion here that this particular extension of quarters was needed to accommodate the Farm Loan Board, and the way it was brought about was this: They expect that the Secretary of the Treasury will give some quarters in the Treasury Building to the Farm Loan Board and put out of there certain employees of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and instead of transferring them to the building where the rest of the Coast and Geodetic Survey is, he will put those employees into the room of the Efficiency Bureau and leave the Efficiency Bureau without any quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, if the Efficiency Bureau is to be subject to this transfer around, to accommodate any new board or any board that is transferred, it is unfair. It is assumed here and not denied that the Farm Loan Board itself does not need these quarters of the Efficiency Bureau, but somebody else is going to yield up their quarters to the Farm Loan Board, and they are to be accommodated at the expense of the Efficiency Bureau, and that simply means that the Efficiency Bureau, being an independent bureau, has absolutely no security upon its quarters at all. I realize that the Efficiency Bureau is not such a bureau as appeals to the imagination of gentlemen of this House. It is not a bureau that readily would make friends. Unfortunately it is a commission that necessarily opposes in many cases the wishes and views of men in official life. It can not help doing it.

If it accomplishes the result intended it shall accomplish, it must necessarily abolish some places and secure some reform; it must necessarily change the methods that are pursued by men now conducting those bureaus; it must necessarily enforce its views in opposition to the views of men now in power. Necessarily it will have opponents and possibly sincere critics in this House, and it will not have any friends. There is no favor that it can extend, and every act it does necessarily intrenches upon claims or rights or alleged privileges of some person. It depends upon whether Congress wants to take into its own hands the economy and efficiency of the public service, or whether it wants to leave that entirely at the mercy of the chiefs who are affected by it. Gentlemen take the responsibility when they strike out this paragraph as I have redrawn it, so that it does not disturb the officers of the War Department, it does not disturb any other existing department, but leaves this bureau as it is; they take the responsibility of destroying the power and usefulness of the Efficiency Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything on this matter, but I do not think members of the committee understand exactly the situation there. The Auditor for the War Department has 205 clerks under him. He has 75 rooms. That is about three men per room. Some of these rooms have as many as seven men to a room. It is admitted by the chief clerk in the auditor's office of the War Department that they will not need any of these rooms that are now occupied by this board until the 1st day of January. This space has nothing on earth to do with the space which will be given to the Farm Loan Board. It is contemplated now that space will be made for the Farm Loan Board in the Treasury Building itself, so that these officials may be very close to the officials of the Treasury Department. Now, the three additional rooms that were proposed to be given to this board are rooms in which there were some files. Numbers of these rooms are filled with files of the Auditor for the War Department. Now, there are several of these rooms needed for these machines which are intended to be installed as labor-saving machines, and there has been a great deal said here and a great mountain made out of a molehill because Mr. Beatty and gentlemen who have been up here discussing this matter say that they will not have additional clerks, that there will be no need for these additional clerks until the 1st day of January. Then it is contemplated that after the first organization of the Army has gone into effect and the charges against the Treasury begin to come, when they will begin to audit the great additional expense, they will be compelled to have 25 or 30 additional clerks, but they can not get them until December. The deficiency bill in December will probably not get through until some time after Christmas, so the same bill in which you will add the clerks to the auditor's office when they are needed will control this space, and there is no reason on earth why the Efficiency Bureau could not remain right where they are until the time comes when the War Department needs this space or the auditor's department needs the space. Now, that is all there is in it, and your subcommittee investigated it and acted because we felt that there was no necessity of anybody being crowded out of any rooms, as there could not be any clerks at all until the next deficiency bill in December, and the same bill that has the clerks will take care of the space. That is all there is to it.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman means the Efficiency Board will just keep the present rooms they have without any additional rooms.

Mr. SISSON. That the Efficiency Board keep the space which they now have. Does the gentleman want the Efficiency Board to be turned out on the street?

Mr. LOBECK. No.

Mr. SISSON. Well, now, suppose if you did not do this, does the gentleman undertake to say he assumes the responsibility of making an appropriation for a year's rent and turn these people out of the space they occupy in order that they may rent space somewhere else in the city?

Mr. ALLEN. I have not the slightest objection to the language, "Until otherwise provided for," and so forth, in line 16, and following. It is the first part of the paragraph to which I made the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. What is the objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Duplication of work. There is another committee doing the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. I will ask again, what duplication?

Mr. ALLEN. Of expense.

Mr. SISSON. Duplication of what?

Mr. ALLEN. Of expense and effort and in taking the time of the Bureau of Efficiency to do the same work that the efficiency committee now in the Treasury Department has been working on for months and will be ready to report on before the end——

Mr. SISSON. I see the gentleman has been talking to my friend Malburn.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not.

Mr. SISSON. Then he has been talking to somebody else, because the Appropriations Committee thrashed this whole thing out, but there were several committees——

Mr. ALLEN. I happen to know what has been going on down there, and that is the reason I made the point.

Mr. SISSON. The committee had the testimony and the witnesses and they resist any effort on the part of Congress to have this Efficiency Bureau make any investigation down there.

Mr. ALLEN. Because they have their own committee that is already working, and it is merely a duplication of effort.

Mr. SISSON. In other words, you put each department in the position of investigating itself, and that is the very thing Congress does not want done.

Mr. ALLEN. No; we have congressional committees here to investigate each department, and they do it.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, the fact about the business is this, that the law has created this Efficiency Division and authorized the Efficiency Division to do this particular work.

Now, here we find ourselves in an attitude of having the work which that Efficiency Division was created to perform impeded by Members of Congress, who created the division itself. Do one of two things, either abolish this Efficiency Division entirely or give it a fair opportunity to show what can be done. It can do nobody any harm. Now, if you shall put these men out it will be necessary, either in the Senate or by amendment to this bill, to provide for it by renting rooms somewhere else.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to have a provision go into the bill to let the Efficiency Bureau investigate the method of legislation by Congress?

Mr. SISSON. I have no objection to the Efficiency Division doing that.

Mr. MANN. It might add a great deal to the value of Congress to the country and increase very greatly the expense.

Mr. SISSON. I might do it.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman's committee propose something practical along those lines, to let somebody try to apply efficiency methods in this body?

Mr. SISSON. We find the result of the work in this Efficiency Division has been to enable the department to dispense with a great many clerks.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt of it. I am a friend of the Bureau of Efficiency. That is the reason I would like to see them come up here and tell us something.

Mr. SISSON. I would not object to them coming and telling this body something, if they can show us how to save money, and I think it can be easily shown; but there is an indisposition on the part of Congress to-day to be so shown, and I am afraid. But this other matter surprises me in that there should be so much fuss made about it. They only wanted three additional rooms, and they are rooms in which records are kept. Now they propose to put these machines in those rooms, so that these men who want to know how the machines are operated may come and test them out and determine whether or not they are what they want. The real office force will retain the present rooms which they now occupy. Therefore your subcommittee felt that up until the time these men meet in these extra rooms they would have to get them on the deficiency bill, and when they provide for the extra clerks we would provide for the deficiency to be taken care of.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly sympathize with my colleague in this effort, but I want to call his attention to the fact that it is impossible for the House to be successful in maintaining its dignity unless it is consistent. It is the second time to-day we have had this question up—the question of directing an executive department—and I maintain we ought to do it. We are the lawmaking body. I maintained it earlier in the day when the question was up between the Thomas amendment, which authorized the executive department to do something, and the Sutherland amendment, which directed the department to do something. I asked for a roll call on that, and I regret to say that my colleague voted to authorize and not to direct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think in that case the department ought to have discretion. In this case I think they ought to be directed to do it, regardless of their wishes, and I voted as I stated, as everybody else does.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, that is just the reason why we will never get any respect out of any of the executive departments until we assert our prerogatives, because it seems to be more convenient to vote to authorize them to do a particular thing, and we forget that under the Constitution it is not only our power but our duty in all this kind of legislation to direct the executive department to do things. I was glad to see the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], a member of the committee, held the same view that I did, and that he very properly voted to direct them to do it. I think if my colleague and others who had voted the weaker way earlier in the day had in the past and to-day voted to direct, we would not have the present situation which he deplores.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is said that there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth; and, if that is the case, there must be great joy there now.

Mr. BENNET. So far as it is in my power to grant my colleague in any way any amelioration, I am going to do it, and if he can do any substantial thing in connection with this proposition I will vote with him now, consistently with my vote earlier in the day.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of talk about our exercising our power. We have power to say whether a room shall be cleaned with a broom or a dust cloth or in some other way. I never supposed it was absolutely essential that Congress should determine such great questions of that kind with its mighty intellect. After all, a large share of the work of Government must be left to the discretion of administrative officers. We are a legislative body, not an executive body, not an administrative body. My observation is that when Congress undertakes to direct methods of administration it generally put its foot in it, and does not know what it is doing and, as a rule, makes a mistake.

Here we have in the District of Columbia a great many buildings, many owned by the Government, many rented by the Government. Everyone knows that it would be impossible for this House to determine the number of rooms and the location and who should occupy them of all the rooms owned and controlled by the government of the District of Columbia. The committee that sat on that question all the time would have to have its days lengthened and hours lengthened and years lengthened in order to make a report. Of course, we could dispose of one case. One branch of the Government's service gets before a committee, and there is more rivalry between these different branches than there is between parties in the country. One branch of the Government service gets before the committee and makes its showing and the other branch is not heard, and the committee hears one side usually, and usually only one—just what that branch of the public service wants. It may be a good thing. I do not know. I think the Bureau of Efficiency, however, ought to be outside of any building occupied by a department of the Government. It belongs to no department. It is much better to keep the various bureaus of the Treasury Department in buildings occupied by the Treasury Department and let the Bureau of Efficiency go into a building outside, where it belongs, instead of having the Bureau of Efficiency occupy a portion of the Treasury Building, and then let the Treasury bureaus go outside.

There is more or less of interdependence and relationship between all the various bureaus or the activities under the Treasury Department. I have not the slightest doubt myself that the Bureau of Efficiency will be well housed. I do not think they will attempt to do business under their hat, as suggested by the gentleman from New York. I do not think they will be required to. I have more faith than some gentlemen seem to have in the President of the United States. I do not believe the President of the United States will permit the Bureau of Efficiency to be kicked out into the street. The President has jurisdiction over the whole subject. If it needs an appropriation to provide quarters for the Bureau of Efficiency, we can make that; but I do not think Congress ought to undertake to say how many rooms this bureau should have or where it shall be. Therefore I make the point of order again.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payment to Republic of Nicaragua: To enable the Secretary of State to pay, for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua, in accordance with article 3 of the treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua, signed August 5, 1914, $3,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk change, in line 2, the figures "1917" to the words "nineteen hundred and seventeen."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if it is subject to a point of order, I do not care to talk about it.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The treaty has been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order on this paragraph in order to ascertain something in reference to the treaty. I have not the treaty in my hand now, though I examined it. I do not recall just what its terms are. I was under the impression, without recollection, that it provided for the payment of $3,000,000 to the Republic of Nicaragua.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; upon the exchange of the ratifications.

Mr. MANN. That is not the provision in the bill. The provision in the bill is "to enable the Secretary of State to pay for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua, in accordance with article 3 of the treaty between the United States and the Government of Nicaragua, signed August 5, 1914, $3,000,000." I think the treaty does make some authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It provides for the payment of certain obligations by the Republic. I have asked the clerk of the committee to get a copy of the treaty, and I suggest that we pass this over temporarily.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to its going over temporarily.

Mr. MANN. I want to know about it. Of course we are obliged to appropriate the money under the treaty; that is, morally obliged; but I do not think much of the treaty. There has been quite an effort made on the part of a good many gentlemen either having claims against Nicaragua as American citizens or otherwise, or other gentlemen, to get their finger into this pie. I do not know just what the treaty provides for, but I am quite certain that Nicaragua will not see any of the money.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire before we pass this paragraph why the words "for the benefit" are inserted on line 5?

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to find out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have the treaty here, Mr. Chairman. Article 3 of the treaty is as follows:

In consideration of the foregoing stipulations, and for the purposes contemplated by this convention, and for the purpose of reducing the indebtedness of Nicaragua, the Government of the United States shall, on the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, pay for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua the sum of $3,000,000, United States gold coin of the present weight and fineness, to be deposited to the order of the Government of Nicaragua, with such bank or banks or such banking corporations as the Government of the United States shall determine, to be applied by Nicaragua upon its indebtedness or other public purposes for the advancement of the welfare of Nicaragua, in a manner to be determined by the two high contracting parties, all such disbursements to be made on the order drawn—

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order.

[Mr. CANNON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We hear a great deal from the Republican side now about the Mexican policy of the President. We have been hearing a good deal from that side recently. Nobody here or away from here knows what the Republican policy upon that subject is or would be. Republicans seem to be in favor of war because President Wilson is in favor of peace. Ex-Supremé Court Judge Hughes, the candidate of the Republican Party, said in his speech that the President's Mexican policy might be one thing now and another thing three months from now. Well, Mr. Chairman, conditions may change and it may be necessary to have a policy different to meet emergencies as they arise.

The candidate of the Republican Party himself has changed his mind, and for the purpose of accepting a nomination given him by Republican bosses. Four years ago he stated that a Supreme Court Judge ought not to be available for political office; that the Supreme Court must never be dragged into politics; that no man serving in a political office was as necessary to his country's welfare as the unstained dignity and integrity of the Supreme Court; that that court must forever be kept out of politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It seems that that gentleman is somewhat vacillating, for he is now leading the movement that would drag the Supreme Court into politics. So gentlemen on the other side are running a man for President that has undertaken to drag that court into politics. And in order to vote for him you must vote to drag the Supreme Court into politics.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman realize that that gentleman is 100 per cent candidate now?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I know that this same man who said that a Supreme Court judge should not be available for political office is now, according to his own statement, a 100 per cent candidate for a political office, but judging from the gloom and disappointment that followed his western tour he is now down to about 40 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is he not 100 per cent a winner as the case now stands?

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman wants my opinion as to the national election I will give it to him. I do not believe that Mr. Hughes will carry 12 States in the Union. I want to make a prediction for the gentleman's consideration: Mr. Wilson will defeat your candidate 3,000,000 popular votes. This is one election, gentlemen, that the corrupt use of money can not carry. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman concede the State of Maine to Mr. Hughes?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama has been in Maine?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman will not concede Maine to Hughes? Now, in the presence of the gentleman from Alabama and the assembled Democracy, I claim Maine for the Republican candidate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. It is not uncommon for Republicans to claim things or promise things; they can promise glibly and claim freely before the election, but their promises and prophesies are never fulfilled. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now the gentleman talks about the Mexican policy of the President.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask if the gentleman from Alabama can ascertain from what source the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who seems to have the figures with respect to the result in Maine, got them, and what is the plurality?

Mr. HEFLIN. He got them from the disordered imagination of the Republican bosses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me to answer the question?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I claim the State of Maine now because the gentleman from Alabama has been orating in that State. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I have the conviction that I did not drive anybody away from the Democratic Party in Maine, and that is more than your candidate for President can say with regard to Republican voters, for on his western tour he lost you votes by the thousands. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Our candidate has already carried Pikes Peak. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Pikes Peak! Why, it snows there in July [laughter], and if there is a place under heaven where your candidate should run well and be in a congenial climate it is on Pikes Peak in a snowstorm. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I know that my friends are sorry that they have nominated this man Hughes. They are sorry in their hearts. Some one said the other day that you were going to take Hughes down and put up Uncle JOE; and I said if you do, Uncle JOE will make a better race than Hughes. He would, too, for Uncle JOE from every angle is human. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman made reference to the gentleman from Illinois. I heard him make a speech about 15 minutes long criticizing the administration's policy in Mexico, but did he state during that whole 15 minutes what he would have done if he had been in charge?

Mr. HEFLIN. Of course he did not, and we do not want to embarrass him now. The Republicans do not know what they would have done in the past and they do not know what they would do in the future. What they want is a return to political power. That is the burning desire of the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What would Hughes have done? Roosevelt tells us, and he is his mouthpiece, that he would never have written but one note to Germany. What is the answer to that? That he would have sent the fleet. Where would we have been? Engaged in war with a foreign country. And American boys by the hundreds and thousands would have been fighting and dying around Verdun. That is what would have happened.

Now, you seek to make capital out of the Mexican situation. What would you have done with Huerta? What did your President do—Mr. Taft? He refused to recognize that red-handed assassin who assumed control of the Mexican Government when he had murdered President Madero in the capital of the nation. It was Huerta's duty under the constitution to protect and defend him. But he murdered him, and then what happened? He wired President Taft: "I have overthrown the Government and am in control." What did President Taft do? Did he wire back, saying: "I congratulate you, assassin; the Government of the United States extends the hand of recognition to you"? No; he refused to do it. What did he do? [Applause on the Democratic side.] He sent 20,000 troops to the border line, and they have been there ever since. You talk about us keeping soldiers down there. Do you know what is going on and what you are talking about? Five soldiers were killed at Douglas, Ariz., when Taft was President, and he did not go to war with Mexico. You are hard pressed for an issue. Gentlemen, the old party has about petered out. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

We are running a man for President who is the greatest intellectual giant who has been in the White House for a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Not since Hickory Jackson defied the national banks has there been such a brave message as that delivered on behalf of the American people yesterday by Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You have a man running for President. He goes out through the West raising big issues! [Laughter.] After he chased in his imagination the administration across the continent, he touched the hems of its garments, crossed his fingers and said, in the name of the Geodetic Survey and in behalf of the Bureau of the Census, "I pronounce you a miserable failure!" [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Then a Progressive said, "Why, Mr. Hughes, President Wilson has made a good President; he has passed a lot of progressive and constructive measures, and he has prevented a lot of suffering among our people and saved human lives by keeping us out of war," whereupon your candidate is wont to say, "What are constructive measures, the prevention of suffering, and the saving of human life to do with the situation, so long as a horse doctor is in the Geodetic Survey and E. Dana Durand is lost to the Bureau of the Census?" [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, these are the big issues that Candidate Hughes has raised, and when he returned from that dismal Western trip I imagine that I could see him when Messrs. Root and PENROSE, SMOOT, and Murray Crane went out to meet and to greet him and could hear them say, "You had a glorious trip," but he shook his head mournfully. They said, "Cheer up, you are going to be elected," and still he shook his head. And now determined to cheer him, they said, "Your election is a cinch," but still he shook his head. Then lifting his sad eyes to SMOOT, he said, with tears in his voice, "You gentlemen are merely playing a part when you say my election is a cinch. I've been through the West; and down in my heart I wish I were back on the bench." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the message of the President of the United States of date August 8, 1914, transmitting the Nicaragua treaty and other documents.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The treaty referred to is as follows:

NICARAGUAN CANAL ROUTE.

To the Senate:

I transmit, with a view to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Nicaragua, signed at Washington on August 5, 1914, granting to the United States, in return for a money payment for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua, the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interoceanic canal by a Nicaraguan route, the lease for 99 years of Great and Little Corn Islands, in the Caribbean Sea, and the right to establish a naval base on the Gulf of Fonseca.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 8, 1914.

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Nicaragua, signed at Washington on August 5, 1914, granting to the United States, in return for a money payment for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua, the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interoceanic canal by a Nicaraguan route, the lease for 99 years of Great and Little Corn Islands, in the Caribbean Sea, and the right to establish a naval base on the Gulf of Fonseca.

Respectfully submitted.

W. J. BRYAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August, 1914.

The Government of the United States of America and the Government of Nicaragua, being animated by the desire to strengthen their ancient and cordial friendship by the most sincere cooperation for all purposes of their mutual advantage and interest and to provide for the possible future construction of an interoceanic ship canal by way of the San Juan River and the great Lake of Nicaragua, or by any route over Nicaraguan territory, whenever the construction of such canal shall be deemed by the Government of the United States conducive to the interests of both countries, and the Government of Nicaragua, wishing to facilitate in every way possible the successful maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, the two Governments have resolved to conclude a convention to these ends, and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State; and

The President of Nicaragua, Señor Gen. Don Emiliano Chamorro, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Nicaragua to the United States;

Who, having exhibited to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The Government of Nicaragua grants in perpetuity to the Government of the United States, forever free from all taxation or public charge, the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an interoceanic canal by way of the San Juan River and the great Lake of Nicaragua, or by way of any route over Nicaraguan territory, the details of the terms upon which such canal shall be constructed, operated, and maintained to be agreed to by the two Governments whenever the Government of the United States shall notify the Government of Nicaragua of its desire or intention to construct such canal.

ARTICLE II.

To enable the Government of the United States to protect the Panama Canal and the proprietary rights granted to the Government of the United States by the foregoing article, and also to enable the Government of the United States to take any measure necessary to the ends contemplated herein, the Government of Nicaragua hereby leases for a term of 99 years to the Government of the United States the islands in the Caribbean Sea known as Great Corn Island and Little Corn Island; and the Government of Nicaragua further grants to the Government of the United States for a like period of 99 years the right to establish, operate, and maintain a naval base at such place on the territory of Nicaragua bordering upon the Gulf of Fonseca as the Government of the United States may select. The Government of the United States shall have the option of renewing for a further term of 99 years the above leases and grants upon the expiration of their respective terms, it being expressly agreed that the territory hereby leased and the naval base which may be maintained under the grant aforesaid shall be subject exclusively to the laws and sovereign authority of the United States during the terms of such lease and grant and of any renewal or renewals thereof.

ARTICLE III.

In consideration of the foregoing stipulations and for the purposes contemplated by this convention, and for the purpose of reducing the present indebtedness of Nicaragua, the Government of the United States shall, upon the date of the exchange of ratification of this convention, pay for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua the sum of $3,000,000 United States gold coin, of the present weight and fineness, to be deposited to the order of the Government of Nicaragua in such bank or banks or with such banking corporation as the Government of the United States may determine, to be applied by Nicaragua upon its indebtedness or other public purposes for the advancement of the welfare of Nicaragua in a manner to be determined by the two high contracting parties, all such disbursements to be made by orders drawn by the minister of finance of the Republic of Nicaragua and approved by the Secretary of State of the United States or by such person as he may designate.

ARTICLE IV.

This convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their respective laws, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereunto their seals.

Done at Washington, in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, on the 5th day of August, in the year 1914.

RESOLUTION OF RATIFICATION.

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the convention between the United States and Nicaragua, signed at Washington on August 5, 1914, granting to the United States, in return for a money payment, the exclusive proprietary rights for the construction and operation of an interoceanic canal by a Nicaraguan route, the lease of certain islands, and the right to establish a naval base on the Gulf of Fonseca, with the following amendments, to wit:

In Article I, line 2, after the words "United States," insert a comma and the following words: "forever free from all taxation or other public charge," followed by a comma.

At the end of Article III strike out the period and add the following: "or other public purposes for the advancement of the welfare of Nicaragua in a manner to be determined by the two high contracting parties, all such disbursements to be made by orders drawn by the minister of finance of the Republic of Nicaragua and approved by the Secretary of State of the United States or by such person as he may designate."

Provided, That whereas Costa Rica, Salvador, and Honduras have protested against the ratification of said convention in the fear or belief that said convention might in some respect impair existing rights of said States, therefore it is declared by the Senate that in advising and consenting to the ratification of the said convention as amended such advice and consent are given with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing in said convention is intended to affect any existing right of any of the said named States.

[Mr. CANNON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BENNET rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one minute?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that if I will make that speech one more time he will be able to get it in his mind so that he can repeat it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can render no better service to the country than to put Democratic doctrine in the minds and hearts of Republican Congressmen. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I was unable to understand an editorial in the New York Sun of this morning until I heard the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. The New York Sun stated this morning that the Democratic candidate for governor in Maine had announced that it was a case of "safety first" with him, and he was going to stop carrying the Democratic national administration and make his campaign on State issues. I regret this announcement came so closely upon the heels of the return of our friend from Alabama from Maine. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Mexican situation is one with which American Representatives ought to be familiar, it seems to me, and this reiteration of what a man would have done had he been in President Wilson's place gets an answer from what a Republican President did do. From 1809 to 1909, 100 years, Mexico had 53 Presidents, 2 Emperors, and 4 Regents, and the change of dynasty down there was so frequent that precedents were established. President Hayes, in his message to Congress on December 3, 1877, which I find on page 467 of volume 7 of Messages and Papers of the President, said to the Congress:

The revolution which recently occurred in Mexico was followed by the accession of the successful party to power and the installation of its chief, Gen. Porfirio Diaz, in the presidential office. It has been the custom of the United States, when such changes of government have heretofore occurred in Mexico, to recognize and enter into official relations—to recognize and enter into official relations with the de facto government as soon as it should appear to have the approval of the Mexican people and should manifest a disposition to adhere to the obligations of treaties and international friendship.

They occurred so frequently there was a regular custom established—

Now, if the gentleman from Alabama, or any other Member of the House, will look up the official records, he will find that the telegram that the Secretary of State sent to the American Minister at Mexico City followed almost the precise language:

Ascertain whether the de facto Government is prepared to maintain the obligation of treaties and protect the rights of American citizens.

In other words, the Taft administration knowing the precedents followed them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He did not recognize Huerta?

Mr. BENNET. Of course not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the complaint?

Mr. BENNET. Why, the gentleman from Alabama is making the complaint; he seems temporarily to have left the Chamber. The Taft administration between the 19th of February and the 4th of March, 13 days or 12 days—I have forgotten whether it was leap year or not—followed precisely the American custom. Where President Wilson violated all American precedents in relation to Mexico was when on the 13th day of March, 1913, when he had been President only nine days, he sent down word to the embassy there that under no circumstances should Victoriana Huerta be permitted to be President of Mexico. He had no more right to say who should not be President of Mexico than Huerta had to say who should not be President of the United States. I will tell you the mistake President Wilson made. It was a mistake of dimension. He thought he had been elected President of the North American Continent. If he had only remembered that he had been elected President of the United States only we would not have had all this Mexican trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BENNET. I ask for one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BENNET. His situation reminds me of the story of a gentleman out in Illinois who unfortunately got intoxicated, and in the barroom where he got the last of it he made the announcement that he could lick any man in the township. Nobody responded. Then he said, "I can lick any man in the county." Not a man stirred. Then he said, "I can lick any man in the State." There was a fellow from outside the county but within the bounds of the State that took up the challenge, and after he had succeeded in demonstrating the fallacy of the intoxicated gentleman's statement the inebriate raised himself from the floor and said, "I know what is the trouble with me. I tried to cover too much territory." [Laughter and applause.] That is the trouble with President Wilson. If he had stuck to his job of being the President of the United States only and had not tried to be President of Mexico at the same time, we would not have had all these deaths and destruction of property that Mr. Lansing in that grim, grizzly message that he sent a while ago to the Mexican Government, which has been printed as a House document, recounted as a result in Mexico of three years of President Wilson's administration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this motion will prevail, but it seems to me it ought to be made in the interest of the American people, those who pay the taxes to maintain the Government. The House of Representatives under the Constitution of the United States is the only body authorized to originate revenue legislation. We have been up against this question of treaty appropriations before, and the House has not always in times past accepted without question the action of another body. A great legislative problem is presented by this motion to strike out, and I realize that it is too big to be settled this afternoon. But I make it as an individual protest against the manner in which the people of the United States are forced to pay enormous sums of money on what appear to be contracts made by certain representatives of certain departments of the Government of the United States who obtain the sanction of another body, but who do not consult the House of Representatives.

Now, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has not attempted to make any explanation of this paragraph involving the expenditure of $3,000,000 of the people's money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not the paragraph clear? It provides $3,000,000 shall be appropriated to carry out the provisions of the treaty. I do not see what more explanation is needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the House of Representatives given any sanction to the treaty or to the agreement preceding it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They sanction it now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is the time is it, when we are supposed to be drawn into the transaction?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. And if we do not appropriate the money the ratification will not be exchanged. If we do appropriate the money, it will be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But an agreement has been made by a representative of the Government of Nicaragua and a representative of the Government of the United States to take $3,000,000 of the people's money and pay it on the approval of another legislative body, without consulting the House at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And it is approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And now the House of Representatives is requested to appropriate the money in order to complete the transaction. If it is not completed they need not make the appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My point is that the Representatives of the people who are authorized to originate revenue legislation have had no voice in this matter until now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the Constitution they could not very well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is the only time and this is the only place where objection can be made on behalf of the taxpayers of the United States to appropriations of these enormous sums of money to complete contracts by agents of this Government with agents of another Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not completed until the contract is made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is one case in point. We have had other cases. We will be called upon before long, I suppose, to pay $25,000,000 to Colombia for certain alleged rights she claims in the Panama Canal. That has not been provided for in this bill. All we are paying now is $3,000,000 for a right of way across a certain part of Nicaragua. Apparently we are not paying money to Nicaragua. We are paying it to somebody not named, to officials evidently or to the persons to be designated by them, "for the benefit of Nicaragua." If the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and I assume it is, the $3,000,000 is to pay for certain debts. Are we doing this as a sop to Nicaragua? Is it for the purpose of currying favor with the people of that country? What do the people of the United States know about this? What will the House of Representatives know about this after it sanctions the action of two contracting parties outside of the House of Representatives on a two-thirds vote by another body? Why, in addition to Colombia's claims, in a little while we will be called upon to pay $25,000,000 in another transaction to take over the Danish West Indies. I would favor acquiring St. Thomas, but only a few years ago those islands could have been bought by the United States for $5,000,000; now they are to be bought for $25,000,000. What does the House of Representatives, the revenue-creating body of the country, have to do with that? Where have we been consulted? Where have the people been consulted? Five million dollars we could have bought those islands for a few years ago. Now, a new Secretary of State makes a deal, and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A new Secretary of State, to whom the conditions may be new, unmindful of the fact that a few years ago we could have had the Danish West Indies for $5,000,000, now agrees to buy them for $25,000,000. We are supposed to legislate for the taxpayers of the country, and yet we hear of these costly negotiations only through the newspapers. This body, I repeat, is the only body under the Constitution authorized to originate revenue legislation. Yet without our knowledge, without our being consulted in the matter at all, without the Representatives of the people having any voice in the matter, a representative of the Government, not a direct representative of the people, as we are here, suddenly agrees to a raise in the price from $5,000,000 to $25,000,000, and we are to be called upon without question to make the people pay—and this on the simple entry of a paragraph in an appropriation bill which is not even explained to us.

This thing is not new. These propositions come in here and are passed as a matter of form, and we sit in our chairs like automatons to vote them through, knowing they are checked up against the revenues of the United States, knowing full well that the people, who were not consulted, will be expected to pay these enormous bills. It is $3,000,000 to-day. It will be $25,000,000 to-morrow. What it will be under some future Secretary of State the Lord only knows. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose, from the time consumed, that this motion is of about the same character of proceeding as that which preceded it. Nobody really takes it seriously. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] can not reform the Government of the United States or change its character. Under the Constitution the treaty was negotiated between Nicaragua and the United States and submitted to the Senate and ratified by a two-thirds vote of that body.

The treaty provides for a concession to the United States, free from taxation or public charge, of what is known as the Nicaraguan Canal route. It also provides for the lease, for a term of 99 years, of certain islands in the Caribbean Sea belonging to Nicaragua, and also a concession to the United States for the establishment of a naval base in the Bay of Fonseca, on the Pacific coast.

The military experts of the Government say that these naval bases, both in the Caribbean and on the Pacific side, are absolutely essential for the protection of the Panama Canal and for the security of American rights, and that in order to avoid complications of a character that would be very disastrous to the United States this Government should acquire in perpetuity the right to construct a canal by way of the Nicaraguan route, not in the belief that an attempt will be made to construct the canal, but to forestall an attempt on the part of some organization created under the laws of some foreign Government to acquire these rights and construct the canal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] correct in his interpretation of the Monroe doctrine with regard to a matter of that kind?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I do not intend to characterize the interpretation that anybody places upon the Monroe doctrine. That is too speculative to engage the attention of a person so busy as I am with practical things.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, if the Monroe doctrine amounts to anything at all, it ought to mean that we would protect ourselves against foreign intrusion in Nicaragua or elsewhere.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can answer that very briefly. The French canal company that had a concession and which was prosecuting the work of constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, the rights to which were subsequently acquired by the United States and under which the Panama Canal was constructed, obtained its concessions and prosecuted the work without any protest whatever being made by the United States Government, although the Republican Party at that time was in control of the Government; so that I assume that a private company acquiring rights of the character indicated would not technically come within the declaration of President Monroe, although somebody might construe as an unneutral act the effort of some foreign Government to acquire rights.

Now, to proceed from the point where I was interrupted by this unnecessary diversion of my thought, under a Republican administration a treaty was negotiated and ratified by the Senate, and a Republican Congress actually appropriated $20,000,000 to pay to Spain for the transfer of the Philippine Islands. The Republicans did not think that there was a great outrage committed upon the House when it was done.

In reference to the Danish West India Islands, if I recall correctly, Mr. Hay, while Secretary of State, negotiated a treaty for the acquisition of those islands, which was ratified by the United States Senate, and only the failure of the people of Denmark to ratify the treaty prevented the House being called upon to make the appropriation. Now, this treaty is so drawn that the ratifications are not to be exchanged without the payment of the money, and if Congress declines to appropriate the money there will be no binding obligation, and that is what makes the treaty really effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a few minutes more. It may save a lot of misstatements hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have a canal at Panama now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the necessity for taking over a canal route in Nicaragua, in view of the fact that we are already provided with a canal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The belief that there is the possibility that some foreign Government, acting through a private corporation, might acquire the route and have a canal constructed. If it did, in view of the fact that it would make a very much shorter route from Europe or from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific seaboard, our canal would be practically idle and could not stand the competition. To avoid any complications of that character the United States Government, in acquiring its naval bases which are essential for the protection of the Panama Canal, has taken in as incidentals, for the purpose of avoiding possible trouble in the future, all rights to build a canal by way of the Nicaraguan route.

Mr. SISSON. The Army and Navy were consulted, too.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I have stated that the military experts were consulted. The hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, all of which are to be published in the RECORD at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], contained the statement of the Secretary of State that the Department of State has been controlled entirely by the judgment of the military authorities of the Government as to the necessity for these naval bases.

Complaint is made that the treaty itself does not disclose the individuals to whom the payments are to be made. Nicaragua is in debt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought I had five minutes, and only three minutes have elapsed since I made the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman's time will be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The treaty provides that the money shall be applied by Nicaragua upon its indebtedness. The Senate amended the treaty by adding the words—

> Or other public purposes for the advancement of Nicaragua, in a manner to be determined by the high contracting parties, such disbursements to be made by orders drawn by the minister of finance of the Republic of Nicaragua and approved by the Secretary of State of the United States or by such person as he may designate.

If Nicaragua has public creditors, and this money is to be paid to Nicaragua, and these public creditors are citizens of other nations which may be pressing Nicaragua for the payment of these obligations, perhaps threatening to seize its customhouses or other sources of revenue in order to enforce payment—a practice not uncommon in the dealing of European nations with Central and South American countries—then it would seem to be particularly advantageous for the United States, in such a treaty as this, if it could obtain the consent of Nicaragua, to provide that the money to be paid by the United States should be used for the purpose of discharging the public indebtedness of Nicaragua and not be dissipated without any benefit to the people. Or it can be applied under this provision for the advancement of the public welfare. I assume, although I do not know, that the Senate of the United States, having this treaty under consideration from the 22d of August, 1914, to 18th of February, 1916, made all the investigation and obtained all the information necessary and desirable in order to enable it intelligently to perform its constitutional function of advising and consenting to the ratification of treaties. The question presented to the House is whether it will appropriate this $3,000,000 for the purpose of having this treaty made effective, so as to obtain the naval bases which it is said are essential for the security of the United States.

If the gentleman does not wish to protect the Panama Canal and secure the United States as its military advisers insist should be done, he will insist on his motion. If this provision is stricken out, it will leave the Panama Canal at the mercy of other nations. If the gentleman in this important step wishes to secure the Panama Canal and to secure our rights and interests in Central and South American countries and the West Indies, he will join the patriotic Democrats in the House and vote for the appropriation. He has his choice; he can withdraw his motion and show his patriotism or he can proceed in his efforts to defeat this appropriation and show his hostility to the real interests of the people of the United States, the "common people," about whom he has been so idly prating to-day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him if in ordinary daily transactions, either personal or as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, he would care to pay $3,000,000 to unknown parties for the settlement of debts unknown?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would depend on what I was going to get. If I were to pay $3,000,000 for what I wanted, I would not be very much concerned as to the disposition of what I was to pay by the persons entitled to receive it. I would not be poking my nose too persistently into other people's business. If the person to whom I was willing to pay the money asked me to aid him to have the money paid in such a manner as to discharge his obligation, I might very willingly, out of my generosity, aid him in wiping out his obligation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL FARM LOAN BOARD.

For salaries and expenses under the Federal Farm Loan Board created by the act approved July 17, 1916, including the salaries of four members thereof at the rate of $10,000 each per annum, and their actual necessary traveling expenses, and such salaries, fees, and expenses as are authorized by said act, $100,000. A detailed statement of expenditures hereunder shall be made to Congress, and hereafter detailed estimates for appropriations for the Federal Farm Loan Board shall be annually submitted to Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, on page 6, line 19, after the word "Congress," the following: "That not to exceed $10,000 of this appropriation may be used for the purpose of housing in rented quarters such bureaus of the Treasury Department that it may be necessary to move in order to install the Federal Farm Loan Board in the Treasury building: Provided, That the Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate the methods of transacting the public business in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and prepare recommendations for the improvement thereof and submit the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as early as practicable for his approval and its action hereunder to Congress."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to the latter part of the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will have to make a point of order to the whole of it, if any.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well, I will make a point of order to the whole of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order to the whole or to a part?

Mr. ALLEN. I wanted to make the point of order to the latter part, but I understand I have to make it to the whole and then let the other part be reoffered. It is the same matter that we had up earlier in the afternoon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is all legislation we concede is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCLINTIC). The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Refunding internal-revenue taxes illegally collected: The payment of six claims, aggregating $27,992.76, allowed by the Auditor for the Treasury Department and certified to Congress in House Document No. 1047, Sixty-third Congress, second session, appropriated for by the deficiency appropriation act approved July 29, 1914, and further described in House Document No. 1264 of the present session, is revoked, and of the said sum of $27,992.76 the sum of $5,151.93 is made available for the payment of the three revised claims enumerated in House Document No. 1264 of the present session, and the sum of $22,840.83 shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The language of the paragraph is that "payment of six claims is revoked." I suppose that is the language prepared by the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is intended to revoke the claims——

Mr. MANN. I know what is intended. It is intended to revoke the authority to pay certain claims. The claims have not been paid, have they?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the language was prepared by the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What the Treasury Department submitted was revised in the committee.

Mr. MANN. I suppose this will accomplish the purpose, but it says that the six claims are revoked. The claims have not been paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. "To revoke the authorization for the payment of the claims" would be more grammatical and in better form.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was worked out carefully in committee by men who have given a good deal of attention to it. I have not looked into it sufficiently to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

Collecting the tax on legacies, munitions, copper, etc.: For expenses of assessing and collecting the tax as provided by Titles I, II, and III of an act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved ——, —, 1916, and to pay such sums as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may deem necessary, fiscal year 1917, $340,000, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to appoint and pay from this appropriation all necessary officers, experts, agents, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, messengers, and janitors, and to rent such quarters, incur expense for telephone service, purchase such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, and other articles as may be necessary for employment or use in the District of Columbia, or any collection district of the United States, or any of the Territories thereof: Provided, That not more than $40,000 of the amount appropriated may be used for the employment in the District of Columbia of additional clerical help in the District of Columbia at rates to be fixed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for the purpose of such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, and other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia.

On page 9, at the end of line 25, insert:

Provided further, That this sum shall not be available until the Bureau of Efficiency shall have investigated the methods of transacting the public business in the Bureau of Internal Revenue and made recommendations for the improvement thereof and submitted the same to the Secretary of the Treasury for his approval, and the work of the Bureau of Efficiency hereunder shall be performed within 60 days of the approval of this act.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALLEN. It is new legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. ALLEN. It necessarily increases the appropriation, because it requires that they be employed upon that when they could be doing something more profitable elsewhere.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr Chairman, it is a limitation upon an appropriation and is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, all provisions in the form of limitations are not limitations. While I am in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to have the Bureau of Efficiency make this investigation, I do not think that they can do it in this guise. The proposition has been presented twice to the Chair already, and ruled out of order, directing the Bureau of Efficiency to make this investigation in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. That was positive legislation. I suppose it requires positive legislation to authorize them to do ti.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they are authorized to do it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman now proposes to hold up a sum of money for the collection of the income tax until the Bureau of Efficiency shall make these investigations. That is a positive requirement. It has no relation whatever to the provision in the bill about the collection of the internal revenue. It is not a germane amendment. I think it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not. There is no authority whatever for the provision in the bill. No such taxes exist as the money provided in this paragraph makes provision to collect. Of course, the item is put in in anticipation of legislation, but there is no such legislation. This limits the expenditure of that money under certain conditions. Even if the provision were a legislative provision, as it relates to the Bureau of Internal Revenue, for which the appropriation is made, it would be germane and not subject to the point of order. This amendment is clearly a limitation upon the appropriation and not subject to the point of order. Not only that, but the provision in the bill itself is legislation, and a germane amendment to it is in order. No point of order was reserved against the provision in the bill. There is no law authorizing this provision in the bill, because there are no such taxes. This amendment has been prepared for the purpose of avoiding the question of order that has been raised against the provision that would insure an investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue by somebody besides the employees in that bureau itself. The provision has been prepared in such a manner as to enable the committee itself to determine this question and not to have it rely upon the judgment of a Member of the House. It is clearly a limitation upon an appropriation.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has ruled twice this afternoon on this same proposition. They are now seeking to do by indirection what they can not do by direction. It is an attempt, after a paragraph appropriating money for a certain specific purpose, to prevent the discharge of that obligation by not permitting the expenditure until certain things are done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this question has not been ruled upon at all. There was one provision in the bill which was subject to the point of order, and when the question was raised, and it was admitted that it was subject to the point of order, it went out. There was an amendment just offered by myself which was subject to the point of order. When the question was raised it was admitted that it was subject to the point of order. This amendment is not subject to the point of order. It has been prepared so as to come within the rule.

It is a limitation upon this provision. Simply because amendments which were subject to the point of order have been disposed of by a ruling which eliminates them, that does not control provisions which are prepared to come within the rule and to be in order upon the bill. The gentleman's contention that the question has been ruled upon twice is as far-fetched as is his contention that this is not in order on the bill. It is a limitation under the rule, and the committee or the House has a right to put a limitation upon the expenditure of money. This is what this provision does, and it ought to be adopted in the interest of efficiency and good administration.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCLINTIC). The Chair will hold, in the absence of the regular Chairman, that this is a limitation upon the appropriation, and the point of order is overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest it is now half past 5 o'clock——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. McCLINTIC, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17645, the general deficiency bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MARTIN HUHN (H. R. 1528).

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1528, a bill for the relief of Martin Huhn, and that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 1528. An act for the relief of Martin Huhn.

The Senate amendment was read.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. EAGAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same.

H. R. 17567. An act to authorize the county of Luzerne, State of Pennsylvania, to construct a bridge across the North Branch of the Susquehanna River from the city of Wilkes-Barre, county of Luzerne, Pa., to the borough of Dorranceton, county of Luzerne, Pa.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5987. An act to amend subsection 11 of section 3244, Revised Statutes;

S. 6839. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Juneau, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes; and

S. 6561. An act providing for the sale at public auction of all unsold suburban lots not reserved for public purposes in the Government town site of Port Angeles, Wash., and for the issuance of patents for those previously sold under the act of May 2, 1906, on the payment of the price at which the said lots were reappraised under said act without further condition or delay.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, August 31, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17646) to amend section 6 of an act to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of moneys issued or coined by the United States, to refund the public debt, and for other purposes, approved March 14, 1900, as amended by the act of March 4, 1907, by the act of March 2, 1911, and by the act of June 12, 1916, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1181), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. REAVIS: A bill (H. R. 17696) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Soloman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND: A bill (H. R. 17697) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. Buchanan; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SWITZER: A bill (H. R. 17698) granting a pension to Stanford W. Rife; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DARROW (by request): Memorial of Rev. H. C. Schneider and others, of Philadelphia, Pa., against seizure of our mails, etc., by the British; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GRIEST: Memorial of members of Hershey Mennonite Church, of Kinzers, Pa., against universal military service, etc.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GRIFFIN: Petition of George W. Greene, president Home Talk Publishing Co., protesting against the passage of House bill 14066, providing for the copyrighting of faces of type; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of James A. Boone, of Baltimore, Md., favoring House bill 15731, relative to compensating commissioned warrant officers of the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, petition of Baltimore (Md.) Pearl Hominy Co., favoring passage of the Rainey bill, to repeal the mixed-flour law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of A. Roszel Cathcart & Co., against stamp tax on insurance policies; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of E. H. Koester, baker, against passage of the Rainey bill, House bill 9409, repeal of the mixed-flour law; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Oriole Lodge, No. 214, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, favoring passage of House bill 16681, "clearance bill"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the Lord Baltimore Press, of Baltimore, Md., against passage of House bill 14666, "design bill"; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. MATTHEWS: Petition of J. C. Bockrath, of Cloverdale, Ohio, against seizure of our mails by the British; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 31, 1916.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, August 29, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Pittman	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Stone
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Taggart
Curtis	Nelson	Sheppard	Thomas
Dillingham	Norris	Simmons	Underwood
Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Vardaman
Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Husting	Overman	Smith, Md.	Williams
James	Penrose	Smith, S. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is no quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. RANSDELL answered to his name when called.

Mr. STERLING and Mr. BRYAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this notice stand for the day.

Mr. COLT, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, has any order been made with reference to the Sergeant at Arms requesting the attendance of absent Senators?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has not been. The Chair was merely assuming, as there was only one more Senator needed to make a quorum, that perhaps that Senator could be found.

Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THREATENED RAILWAY STRIKE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have, since the recess of last evening, received a large number of telegrams from corporations and individuals in my State, and a few from adjoining States, of which this, from Grand Junction, Colo., is a sample:

GRAND JUNCTION, COLO., August 30, 1916.

Senator CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.:

At present time there are approximately 75 cars green fruit being moved daily from Mesa County. Understand strike situation has reached critical stage, and that even now some railroads are refusing to receive perishable freight. This is a very serious situation for hundreds of growers in this valley, and means their financial ruin. We feel positive you are giving this matter your usual serious consideration and support and assisting in every honorable way to prevent a tie-up on our railroads for even one day.

GRAND JUNCTION FRUIT GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

These telegrams, Mr. President, merely emphasize the critical conditions now prevailing all over the country. I have no doubt other Senators have received similar supplications from their respective constituencies. My purpose in occupying the time of the Senate with the subject is to emphasize the fact that five days before the strike order issued by the brotherhood is to take effect the railroad companies of the United States began to place an embargo upon the shipment of foodstuffs which are embraced in the general orders regarding perishable freight. It would seem that instead of utilizing their facilities for the concentration of foodstuffs in the communities of this country for the sustenance of their people they are adopting the opposite policy; and if this strike shall materialize, and suffering shall come to the people of the great communities of the United States, they will not forget that prior to the time that the strike is to take effect foodstuffs are being denied access to lines of transportation for their relief.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have also received a large number of telegrams since the recess of yesterday, and I shall read one of them. The telegram is from Tacoma, Wash.:

TACOMA, WASH., August 30, 1916.

WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Organized labor of this community urges, if it comes before you for action, that the railroad workers be granted an eight-hour day at present wages, and demand that no legislation be enacted imposing compulsory servitude even for a day, and at no time compulsory arbitration be enacted.

REA LAST,
Secretary Central Labor Council.

Mr. President, I desire to introduce the remainder of these telegrams, and ask that simply the signatures to them be printed in the RECORD, and that they be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Telegrams from the North Yakima Trades and Labor Council of Washington; from R. Loewe, secretary of the Metal Trades Council of Seattle, Wash.; from Rea Last, secretary of the Central Labor Council of Tacoma, Wash.; from O. F. Wefferling, secretary of the Trades Council of Everett, Wash.; from Frank W. Cotterill, of the Building Trades Council of Seattle, Wash.; from James A. Duncan, secretary of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, Wash.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have also several telegrams similar to the one which has just been read by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which I will not ask to have read, but that the signatures may be placed in the RECORD. I want to call attention, however, to the fact that one of them purports to represent the sentiment of a mass meeting of the citizens of my own town of North Yakima, Wash., in the fruit section, and they set out the conditions described by the Senator from Colorado. I simply ask that the signatures of these telegrams be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Telegrams from the Commercial Club of North Yakima, Wash.; from the Commercial Club of Walla Walla, Wash.; from R. L. Rutter, of Spokane, Wash.; from S. J. Harrison, of Kiona, Wash.; and from H. M. Gilbert, of Toppenish, Wash.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I somewhat regret that this matter is being discussed in precisely the form in which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has discussed it. I think we all ought to keep our heads, and not condemn either side to this controversy at the present time. I do not know whether the railroads are in all matters acting wisely or unwisely, but I have no idea that they are doing anything that in their view is detrimental to the public good.

I have a telegram from the New Orleans Board of Trade, addressed to me, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 30, 1916.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
Washington, D. C.:

The New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.), favoring arbitration between employees and employers of public-service corporations on all questions affecting the vital interest of the whole people of this country, strongly urge your assistance in framing suitable legislation that will promptly attain this end. We believe that arbitration is the only method by which disputes between capital and labor can be satisfactorily settled; any other method as suggested in the settlement of the present railroad difficulty would not dispose of the question at issue, but would advocate the policy of the many being taxed in favor of the few, and would retard the industrial opportunities and future prosperity of the country, as the principles of arbitration must stand behind them. No strategy of any kind can play any part in the decision of this great issue without producing a national calamity.

R. F. CLERC,
Acting President the New Orleans Board of Trade.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has received identically the same message, and the Chair has one other message, which will be simply noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The telegrams were as follows:

From R. F. Clerc, acting president the New Orleans Board of Trade, and from William B. Melish, president, and W. C. Culkins, executive secretary, Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask the same privilege, to submit a telegram showing that $5,000,000 worth of fruit and perishable goods is imperiled by the railway embargo. I ask that the telegram be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

[Telegram.]

SACRAMENTO, CAL., August 30, 1916.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We appeal to you in behalf of the table-grape growers of this State, whose balance of crop hanging on the vines is estimated at $5,000,000 at present market prices. The threatened strike has caused the packing companies to refuse the grapes not already picked because of fear shipments will perish en route. Grapes are ripening every day and should be picked. We have no capacity for handling in cold storage this enormous crop, and our only relief lies by way of averting the strike or action by Congress that will cause Government to handle transportation. Do everything you possibly can to circumvent the impending financial disaster to our table-grape growers. Coming as it does on top of threatened Federal tax on wine-grape growers, California's viticultural industry is indeed in sorry plight. Can you help us?

STATE BOARD OF VITICULTURAL COMMISSIONERS,
E. M. SHEEHAN, Secretary.

Mr. OLIVER. I have received a telegram from the Chicago Association of Commerce, of Illinois. As the telegram is short, I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the telegram will be read.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., August 30, 1916.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Chicago Association of Commerce urges upon the President and upon Congress that it is inconsistent with the ideals of our Government and subversive of its principles that legislation should be had in the pending railroad crisis without time and opportunity for due consideration. The questions involved are complex and intricate, and, while the Congress has the final responsibility, it has not hitherto had either the time or opportunity to consider them. When the legislation occurs it should be well considered and fair to all interests. It is impossible and inconsistent with the dignity of Congress and of the American people that this should be accomplished under the shadow of the impending strike. We therefore insist that the President and the Congress, jointly or acting separately, as may be determined, demand that the date for the pending strike be postponed for such reasonable time as may permit Congress to act freely and intelligently and call upon the patriotism of the trainmen to accede to such demand.

The CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
JOHN W. O'LEARY, President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received telegrams similar to the one the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has just read, from all of the fruit shippers of my State. I have not presented them to the Senate, because I took it for granted that all Senators representing fruit districts had received similar telegrams in relation to the railroads refusing to accept shipments of fruit at this time. So far as my own State is concerned, I will say that most of the fruits that are shipped out of the State of Utah go to points that it would take 10 or 12 days to reach, most of it going to Chicago and eastern points. I think it is very much better that the fruit growers should understand that there is danger of a strike before the fruit could reach the point of shipment, than for the railroads to receive the fruit, and then have it tied up somewhere between the shipping point and the point of destination.

I, Mr. President, so far as the refusal of the railroads to take fruit at Grand Junction, Colo., or points in Utah is concerned, would not at this time—there being only a few days before the strike is to take place—find fault with the railroads under the conditions, and if I were a shipper of fruit, I would very much prefer to have the railroads say that they would not receive it because it could not reach its destination before the time set for the strike, rather than to accept it and have it fail to reach its destination.

I recognize, Mr. President, the burdens that will be placed upon the fruit growers of every State in this Union if the threatened strike takes place. We all know what it will mean to the business of this country, and I hope and trust that some means may be devised whereby the strike will be averted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have received a number of telegrams similar to the ones which have been read and discussed before the Senate this morning.

I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that it would be better for the railroads to refuse to receive perishable freight if the destination was so far away that it could not reach its destination before the 4th of September, the day fixed for the strike. There is a degree of caution in that act which I am not disposed to condemn. But I have no doubt in the world that the railroad managers are doing a good many things just now for the purpose of impressing upon the American people and the Congress the horrors of the disaster with which the country is threatened to-day; and, of course, the spirit of such conduct is reprehensible. I think that the Congress should take action, coupled with that which the President has already done, looking to a postponement, if possible, of the day of the strike.

I appreciate, as every other American citizen appreciates, the fearful consequences of this strike. I do not hesitate to say that my sympathies are entirely with the employees of the railroads. I do not think they get a fair share of the product of their own toil. I want them to win and therefore I am especially desirous that they will so act as not to forfeit the sympathy which the American people have for them, and which is so necessary to their success in any effort to get justice. I believe if a joint resolution should be passed by the Congress asking that the day for the strike be postponed that they will hearken to that advice. I know these patient toilers do not want to do anything that will bring disaster upon the country which would surely follow a strike; and we all realize that, if the matter goes on and the strike is called, the loss of property and the suffering of the innocent and helpless will be tremendous. It will not do to permit the strike to be called until Congress and the Executive shall have exhausted every legitimate means possible to avert it. I think if the Congress would take action this morning looking to the adoption of a joint resolution, not "demanding," as the telegram just read by the Clerk says, but requesting that the day for the strike be postponed until this Congress, which is seriously considering the question of settling amicably the difference between the railroads and their employees, can act in the matter, they will hearken to that advice. Any other course or the part of the employees of the railroads would be very disappointing to their friends in and out of Congress. The exigencies of the present time, the unusual conditions with which the American people are confronted, and the problems that Congress is called upon to solve, demand the purest patriotism and the highest order of statesmanship to treat the situation successfully. Selfishness and a desire to achieve a mean personal advantage are wholly out of place at this critical moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some telegrams I have received from my home city, three or four of which I want to read in full, some I shall only quote from briefly.

This proposed railroad strike is a crisis in our Nation. I believe this Government should be big enough to force arbitration. It looks like this is fair to everybody. A strike would inflict great injury on everyone.

I read a telegram from the Evans Smith Drug Co.:

We believe legislation should be immediately enacted prohibiting this strike, thereby preventing great loss and distress to the country at large. We urge you to use your influence in stopping this calamity.

A similar telegram from the Faxon & Gallagher Drug Co. contains this statement:

We believe legislation should be promptly enacted prohibiting strikes and lockouts—

And so forth, giving reasons.

An excerpt from a telegram from the Adams Transfer & Storage Co. is as follows:

Liberal legislation should be promptly enacted prohibiting strikes and lockouts, thereby preventing great loss and distress.

One from the Kansas City Fruit & Produce Dealers' Club contains this sentence:

Surely Congress will rise to the occasion and protect the entire country from this injustice.

There are other expressions in the telegrams, but they are all in a vein similar to the telegrams I have read in full.

Here is a telegram of a little different tenor, from the Richards & Conover Hardware Co.:

In the interest of all the people, hope you will use your best efforts toward the quick enactment of some legislative measure which will avert threatened railroad strike. Am sure all good Americans will stand as a unit in backing up any effort made by Congress to prevent strike.

Here is one from the Moore Transfer Co.:

We believe public interests more vital than those of railroad employees and that legislation should be enacted immediately to prevent the threatened strike and consequent loss to all mercantile and industrial lines of business as well as individual suffering and inconvenience.

Here is a telegram of special interest from C. A. Phelan, of Harrison, Ark.:

Being interested in railroad property of Joplin Union Depot Co. and Missouri & Northern Arkansas Co., I want to ask that you use your influence toward granting railroads an increase in passenger and freight rates in order to carry additional burden which may be placed on railroads in meeting demands of train and engine men for higher wages and shorter days.

One from the Kansas City Transfer & Storage Co. reads as follows:

We urge that you bring all possible pressure upon Congress to show its hand and prevent the railroad men going out while peace negotiations can be at work.

The Smith-McCord-Townsend Dry Goods Co. wires as follows:

Union Pacific road refused to-day to accept shipments of nonperishable merchandise * * * for points beyond Kansas. Other roads likely to follow, and by Friday all lines may refuse freight. Seems to us an outrage on the American people that the roads are obliged to take this action. Is the strike inevitable? Can you give us any encouragement?

I also read a telegram from the railway shop employees of the Missouri Pacific Iron Mountain system:

Respectfully urge upon you to work and vote for the inclusion of all railway employees in the proposed legislation to establish the eight-hour day for the transportation employees.

Yours, respectfully,

SEDALIA LOCAL FEDERATION.
W. S. SIMS, Secretary.

Mr. President, in connection with these telegrams, I want to offer one or two observations, and I shall be exceedingly brief.

A number of the gentlemen who send these telegrams seem to think that Congress has the power to pass a law forbidding the railway trainmen to quit work. There is little to be said in addition to what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said on that question yesterday. Of course, it is utterly impossible to pass a law that will meet this emergency if we are to undertake to meet it by simply enacting a statute which shall command the men to continue in their employments. Neither can such a result be accomplished by indirection. We can not meet this issue in the way the authors of these telegrams evidently think it can be met, namely, by passing a law commanding these men to stay at their posts and to perform their usual duties on the railroads. But I want to call special attention to this clause in a telegram which I have already read:

Seems to us an outrage on the American people that the roads are obliged to take this action.

That is, to refuse to receive freight.

Mr. President, is that true? Is that a correct statement of the facts? I think the country ought to know who are responsible for the present condition. What are the facts?

The trainmen long ago asked an eight-hour day. They further asked, if they were obliged to work beyond the eight hours, that they should be given time and a half for the extra hours. That proposition was presented to the managements of the roads. The managements declined to grant the request. The only point at issue raised by the men was whether the day should be eight hours with pay for overtime if the railroads worked them overtime. The men complain that they are obliged to work overtime unnecessarily. Under some regulations that have been made between the men and the railroads, the hauling of a freight train 100 miles is regarded as a day's work, and a freight train moved at the rate of 12½ miles an hour will conclude its trip in eight hours.

The men insist that one of the principal reasons they are unable to get the train over the hundred miles in the eight hours is because the companies insist upon making the trains of enormous length, so that they either do not have sufficient motive power to haul them at the rate of twelve and a half miles an hour, or, the train being so long, the amount of switching that is to be done is multiplied or increased in proportion to the unusual length of the train. Accordingly it is said that it is impossible to get the train over the road at the rate of twelve and a half miles an hour. It is further urged that not only the men suffer the inconvenience of working overtime, but that the great shipping public suffer, because, as these men put it, the public ought to be entitled to have freight hauled at least as fast as twelve and a half miles an hour. They cite, in proof of the fact that it is entirely practicable to move freight at that rate of speed, the example of two or three railroads that have voluntarily made arrangements with their men based upon the moving of a train at least as fast as twelve and a half miles an hour.

When the men put that proposition up to the managers the managers simply declined it. They offered to arbitrate, provided not only that question was arbitrated but a great number of other questions were at the same time arbitrated—questions that had been for a long time settled between the men and the companies. The men replied that they would arbitrate these other questions, but that they wanted the eight-hour day conceded. The managements of the roads responded that they could not grant the eight-hour day, because it would so increase their expenses that the roads could not afford to make the concession.

In that state of affairs the President of the United States undertook to exercise his influence to bring about an adjustment. The President, who has always taken an impartial view of these great questions, after hearing both sides said that it seemed to him that the eight-hour day was an inevitable thing, that it was bound to come, and urged the managements to concede the eight-hour day, and then urged that all the other questions should be arbitrated, and offered his good offices to promote the creation of an arbitration board that would give due and prompt consideration to all the other questions of dispute.

Now, let the country know that the men accepted the President's proposition, and let the country know that the railroad presidents declined it—declined it, although the President had said to them in substance and effect that if there was any necessity for an increase of rates in order to meet the additional expense, as soon as that fact was ascertained his recommendation to Congress would be made for that increase. Let this Congress understand and let the country understand that the President, occupying his great position of influence, gave that assurance to these railroad presidents.

Let the country understand, as Congress now does well understand, that if this increase of expense should be made under these conditions, the Interstate Commerce Commission would be bound to take that increased expense into consideration in passing upon every freight rate filed with it, and that, as far as the laws and customs of the country can give guaranty, the railroad presidents have that guaranty already. Every one of them absolutely knows, as certainly as he can know anything that lies within the womb of the future, that they will be granted an increase of rates if they can show that their income and expenses, when laid side by side, warrant such an increase. With these facts fairly before them the railroad presidents took the action which they knew would bring on this strike.

So far as I am concerned, I believe that it is a mistaken economic policy to work men over eight hours when they are engaged in the dangerous and hazardous business of railroading. I believe that the interests of the traveling public demand that men shall not be put under the intense strain that men operating trains necessarily endure more than eight hours. Investigation has shown that the great majority of railway accidents in this country have occurred because of some lapse of memory or some mistake made by men who have been subjected to too hard a strain and who for the moment relaxed their vigilance, at the awful cost of life or limb.

We are talking here about averting this difficulty. I concur in what was so well said by my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. The railway employees ought to give Congress a chance. They ought to give us some time; but they are not the only parties to this controversy. The railway presidents by doing that which the President of the United States, from his impartial and high position, urged may avoid this strike the moment they act, and they can do it without jeopardizing their property, without taking anything like the hazard of loss that is bound to result if the strike goes on.

Mr. President, if all the transportation business of this country is tied up for one week's time, the loss to the railroads will be greater than the increase of pay for a year's time, and the railroad presidents know it.

I do not want to make an extreme statement on the floor of the Senate or elsewhere, but I state it as my deliberate judgment that there are great forces, great financial powers in this country, that want this strike and want it at this time, and that if this controversy goes on, if our country is put to the tremendous disadvantage of loss which will result from a tying up of all its transportation lines, the gentlemen who stand sponsors for the conduct that produced the strike will in the end have cause to seriously regret their action. There are a half dozen men in New York City who can prevent this strike, and they can do it without taking any serious chance of ever losing a dollar to their properties. The only thing necessary for them to grant is the eight-hour day—all other questions to be arbitrated and settled.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a minute?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Is there not much more involved in it than the mere question of eight hours? Does it not involve practically an increase of pay? Does it not amount in this instance to a demand that they shall be paid for 8 hours what they have been getting under the past arrangement for 10 hours? If it does, I put the question to the Senator from Missouri, for he is a good lawyer, have we a right to prescribe the rate that the railroad companies shall pay their employees? I put that question to the Senator because he is a good lawyer. I want to hear from him on that point.

Mr. REED. The question that I am discussing is the practical question of what can be done at this time. What I am urging is that there are a very few gentlemen in this country who can prevent the strike by granting the eight-hour day. Of course that means the eight-hour day, without a reduction of pay. That is the practical meaning of it. That is what these men mean; and if they are compelled to work overtime; or, to state it differently, that they be insured the eight-hour day by a penalty affixed for working the men over eight hours, namely, by pay for time and a half in lieu of straight pay for time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that my understanding is that the railway employees have agreed to yield the time and a half pay for hours of work in excess of eight hours, if they can get the eight-hour day concession. The extra hours worked will be at the regular day wages. And I think it a liberal concession, because I have been told by some of the members of the brotherhood that they really desired that the hours of labor per day be restricted to eight hours. I think eight hours is long enough for some of the railroad men to work—the engineers, for instance, who suffer great nervous strain while on duty.

Mr. REED. The Senator may be correct in that. That is not the question I am discussing. I am discussing the question of responsibility.

Here are 450,000 employees on one hand; on the other hand, there are a few financiers. The financiers can avert the strike if they want to. Let nobody make the mistake of thinking that it is any other influence or power than the financial power that is controlling the railway presidents.

The president of one of the great railroad systems of this country, who, I think, controls nearly 13,000 miles of railroad, was a practicing lawyer of rather limited experience in my city up to a few months ago. He was absolutely without any railroad experience. He did not go into that great position because he was a practical railroad man or had ever been the manager of great properties. He is in that position in a representative capacity; and, by the way, he was the chairman of the most important committee appointed by the railroad presidents to negotiate with the President of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator in that remark reminds me of an instance occurring some four or five years ago, where a prominent manager of a large railroad system made the statement that in these days railroad presidents amount to nothing more than the representatives and mouthpieces of New York financial interests.

Mr. REED. I think an investigation will show that to be largely true.

Now, I have no warfare to make upon the gentlemen who have invested their money in the stocks and bonds of railroads. I want them treated fairly, but I warn those gentlemen that the United States will hardly look with favor upon a line of policy that permits all the transportation of the country to be tied up.

I have said more than I intended to say. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asked me a question as to whether we could compel the payment of certain wages, for that is really the meaning of the Senator's question. Although recent decisions of the Supreme Court have extended the power of Congress to regulate interstate-commerce carriers far beyond the limit that I thought would be set, I very much doubt the power of Congress to regulate the wages of the men; but I will tell you a power I do not doubt. Congress has the inherent power, and the power under the Constitution, to keep the great lines of interstate commerce open. If this matter is pressed to the extremity, it will be discovered by the owners of these roads that Congress can keep them open; that when a management can not keep its road running, legal authorities can keep it running.

I said yesterday, and I say now, there ought to be a plain statute upon the books providing that whenever it shall be made to appear that the United States has contracts with a railroad company to carry the mails and it is about to permit that transportation to be interfered with, the courts can take possession of the railroad and run it. Railroad companies have had no difficulty in getting receivers appointed when they have had little controversies among their stockholders. They have had no difficulty in getting receivers appointed when they had made a contract to pay somebody interest on a certain day of the month and are unable to pay on the day fixed. They at once rush into court and prevent the seizure of the road by having a receiver appointed. We have had these receiverships for a multitude of causes, but based upon the allegation that some private individual has contractual rights with the company. The Government of the United States has contracts with these companies that involve the greatest business being conducted in the world, to wit, the United States Post Office business, a business that is not only the largest in volume of any business in the world but that affects the interests of more people than any other business in the world.

I concur very heartily with the view expressed by the Senator from Mississippi to the effect that if Congress would pass a resolution it might appeal strongly to the men, but I think along with that resolution of appeal to the men Congress can well turn a countenance that is not altogether amicable and smiling toward the men representing the other side of this controversy, who can by complying with the just requests of the President of the United States end the possibility of this strike within the next hour.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, everything that has transpired since this question came before the Senate but adds proof to the correctness of the position that I announced a few moments ago, that we need time. I am personally, and in the performance of my function as a part of this great governmental body, as much opposed to doing an injustice to the railroad companies as I am to the men who labor to make the railroad companies or their stock worth anything. I desire to be absolutely just to both parties to this controversy.

Hasty legislation at this time on this new question may be more hurtful than the damages which will result from tying up the railroads, clogging the channels of commerce, and we can not afford to do it. We can not afford to legislate in the heat of passion. It would be eminently unwise to yield to our resentment, if we have any, at the stubborn and selfish conduct of the railroad presidents who, in the event a strike shall be called, have not anything but dollars and cents to lose. They are not going to suffer for a morsel of bread. They are not going to be denied any of the luxuries of life. Others are to suffer—the helpless women and children and those dependent upon the employees of the roads, and the unoffending public. These will be the sufferers.

This is a new question. Congress is starting out now on an entirely new field of legislation, and I insist that we can not afford to be in a hurry about it. The matter should be carefully and soberly considered. If a joint resolution could be passed by Congress asking the Brotherhood of Engineers, and Conductors, and Firemen, the employees of the railroads, to postpone the day of the strike, I am sure they would do it. I think they can very well trust to Congress to do them absolute justice. I believe a majority of the American people are in sympathy with the laboring people of this country, and will demand of Congress, if the Congress were inclined to do otherwise, that the right thing be done in their behalf.

I want to say again, with great earnestness, that we can not afford at this time to deal hastily and without due consideration with this great problem.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, this morning I received the following telegram:

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., August 30, 1916.

JAMES P. CLARKE.
Member of Senate, Washington, D. C.:

This is to advise you that the railroad shopmen are negotiating at present seeking the eight-hour day, and we would be pleased to see the shopmen be included in any eight-hour law Congress passes affecting railroad men.

E. L. KING,
President Federation Iron Mountain Shops.

Just one word in connection with this telegram. It relates to the momentous controversy which is now pending before the country, which has excited so much interest and so much concern. Its importance and far-reaching character is recognized by all and its complex character is recognized by many.

The power of Congress to establish an eight-hour day for railroad operatives is a matter of very grave doubt. It has been left so by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Many States have attempted to establish an eight-hour law. They have been almost invariably declared invalid, except in instances where they relate to child labor, the labor of women, or those engaged in dangerous occupations, like mining. That was the case in the decision that was made in connection with the statute or probably the provision of the constitution of Utah.

Congress has passed an eight-hour law which applies to all public works designed by the United States or to which it contributes funds. It has been held to apply to the construction of levees on the Mississippi River and a number of other matters. But Congress never has yet passed any law that related to any private or semiprivate employment. It may be that the natural trend of doctrine on this subject will carry the Supreme Court to a point where it will support the action of Congress in establishing an eight-hour day for the operatives who actually manage the trains engaged in interstate commerce. No one is authorized to make the statement that it will. There has not been a single expression of the court that will justify anyone now in saying unconditionally that any such power will be indulged to Congress. There is a so-called hours-of-labor statute making railroads liable for damages that occur to employees who are required to work more than 16 hours a day. If challenged, it will be supported upon the proposition that that is so obviously a matter that endangers the public safety that it will be sustained; but there is a zone of uncertainty, there is a line that has never yet been laid down to be considered, before we shall be justified in saying that Congress has that very wholesome power.

I make that observation in connection with the suggestions of my constituents and friends at Little Rock, Ark., who have done me the honor to send me this telegram.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask that my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] may be excused indefinitely on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's colleague is excused.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have word this morning from my colleague [Mr. GOFF] that he is ill at his home, and therefore, can not attend upon the sessions of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that, pending his illness, he be excused from attendance upon the Senate and from the operation of the order which the Senate has heretofore entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 354, 355, 356, and 359 to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and agrees to the same; recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 361 and agrees to the same with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, and further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 58 and 108 to the bill.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of the Manufacturers' Club, of Philadelphia, and of the Bourse, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that the present railroad controversy be submitted to arbitration, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Josephine County, Oreg., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for the compulsory observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against the stamp tax on insurance companies, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of California, remonstrating against increasing the tax on the net income of life insurance companies, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of an inheritance-tax law, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JAMES. I present a communication signed by a large number of railroad men of Winchester, Ky., and also a number of telegrams that I have received from the president of the Central Labor Union of Paducah, Ky.; from the secretary of the Trades and Labor Assembly of Covington, Ky.; from the secretary of the United Trades and Labor Assembly of Louisville, Ky.; from the chairman of the legislative committee of the Kentucky State Federation of Labor; and from the Burley Tobacco Co., of Louisville, Ky., relative to the passage of immediate legislation to prevent the threatened railroad strike or to defer it until just settlement can be made through arbitration. I ask that the communication and telegrams be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the communication and telegrams were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WINCHESTER, KY., August 22, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned railroad men at this place (Winchester, Ky.), do earnestly beseech you to use your good office to promote an eight-hour national labor law for all classes of railroad work.

As the country is very much agitated over this matter, we hope you will give this matter due consideration. You will notice that we are working from 10 to 12 hours per day.

Hoping that this will meet with your approval, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

J. M. WALDEN
(And many others).

PADUCAH, KY., August 31, 1916.

Senator OLLIE JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

We indorse railroad men's request for eight-hour work day.

ROY HURT,
President Central Labor Union, Paducah, Ky.

COVINGTON, KY., August 31, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
Washington, D. C.:

The Trades and Labor Assembly of Kenton and Campbell Counties, Ky., insist upon the eight-hour work day at present compensation for the railroad employees, and protest against any law imposing involuntary servitude.

W. R. MCLINDON,
Secretary Trades and Labor Assembly.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 31, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE JAMES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

After a careful perusal of the contemplated legislative program intended to meet the present contingencies surrounding the possibilities of a Nation-wide strike, we emphatically protest against the enactment of any law which fosters compulsory arbitration or any other method which would force a condition of involuntary servitude upon the workers of this land.

Respectfully,

PHIL OSSMANN,
Secretary United Trades and Labor Assembly.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 31, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE JAMES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The legislative committee of the Kentucky State Federation of Labor unqualifiedly subscribes to the demands of the Brotherhoods of the Railroad Trainmen and emphatically protests against the enactment of any law which entails arbitration by compulsion, with a view to impose upon the workers of this country a condition which smacks of involuntary servitude.

JOHN SCHNEIDER, Chairman.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 31, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Realizing the enormous and apparently unnecessary loss to which the proposed railroad strike will subject the Nation, we respectfully urge that you use your influence in favor of the passage of immediate legislation to prevent strike or defer same until just settlement can be made through arbitration.

BURLEY TOBACCO CO.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 6975) authorizing Anton Hiersche to select other land in lieu of land now owned by him, required for reclamation purposes and for a bird reservation; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 6976) granting a pension to Elizabeth Gates Perry (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioner General of Immigration to increase the salary of the Commissioner of Immigration at New Orleans, La., and to pay the same out of the lump sum appropriated for that purpose, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 17645), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHAFROTH submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $150,000 for the erection of a public building for the United States post office in the city of Durango, Colo., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 17645), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—JAMES D. HARRIS.

On motion of Mr. OLIVER it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 5809) to increase the pension of James D. Harris, Sixty-fourth Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE WITH BELLIGERENT GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution (S. Res. 261) to print certain documents. I merely ask for its reference to the Committee on Printing, or, possibly, to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. No; to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] know more about the details. I will read the resolution—it is very brief—and then I can be better advised as to where it should be referred:

Resolved, That 2,000 copies of volumes No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 of Diplomatic Correspondence with Belligerent Governments Relating to Neutral Rights, Duties, and Commerce, issued by the State Department, be printed, and that 1,000 copies thereof be delivered to the State Department for distribution, and that the remainder be so distributed between the Senate and House of Representatives as to divide them as nearly as may be practicable equally between individual Senators and Members of the House.

Just a word, if I may impose upon the attention of the Senate. I hold in my hand volumes 1, 2, and 3. The department advises me that to print 2,000 copies of No. 1 originally would cost $724; of No. 2, $1,466; and of No. 3, $2,663. That is approximately a total of $5,000. They have been printed by the State Department, and I am told by the officer representing the Secretary of State, who was here on yesterday to see me about it, that by using electroplates of the prints already made the cost will be very materially reduced.

I ask leave to have this resolution, with the memorandum attached, and also the copies of the three volumes of correspondence, referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, can the Senator give any reason why the department does not order the copies printed?

Mr. STONE. I am not advised as to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on August 31, 1916, approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution extending until April 15, 1917, the effective date of section 10 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes; receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 1, 354, 355, 356, and 359 to the bill and agreeing to the same; receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 361 and agreeing to the same with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate; and further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 58 and 108 to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I move that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 58 and 108.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I further move that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 361.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is passed.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on yesterday, just before we adjourned, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], stating that he had to leave the city, as we all know he is obliged to do, requested that the Senate should consider out of order an amendment which he offered to the revenue bill. I ask that that amendment be now taken up, so that the Senator may fill his engagement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment referred to will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 144, after section 102a, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 103. That whenever during the existence of a war in which the United States is not engaged the President shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that under the laws, regulations, or practices of any country, colony, or dependency contrary to the law and practice of nations, the importation into their own or any other country, dependency, or colony of any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States and not injurious to health or morals is prevented or restricted the President is authorized and empowered, within his discretion, to prohibit or restrict during the period such prohibition or restriction is in force, the importation into the United States of similar or other articles, products of such country, dependency, or colony as in his opinion the public interest may require; and in such case he shall make proclamation stating the article or articles which are prohibited from importation into the United States; and any person or persons who shall import, or attempt or conspire to import, or be concerned in importing, such article or articles into the United States contrary to the prohibition in such proclamation, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $2,000 nor more than $50,000, or to imprisonment not to exceed two years, or both, in the discretion of the court. The President may change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation in his discretion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I should like to reserve the right to object for the moment in order to ask how the amendment comes before the Senate? Is it on the initiative of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Alabama that the Senator from Kentucky a few days ago introduced this amendment in the Senate, and it was referred to the Finance Committee. The amendment was considered by the majority members of the committee, and I was authorized to accept it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Was the amendment prepared by the Finance Committee, or did it come from the department?

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding, from the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky, was that the amendment meets the approval of the department.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina in reference to this question, that I am not opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky; as a matter of fact, I think it is an amendment that will serve a great many people in the United States. It is an amendment that will protect a great agricultural product in the United States against discrimination, and I am glad that the Secretary of State has taken the initial step toward preparing the amendment and submitting it. I intend to support the amendment. I think it will be of great value to the agriculture of the United States in protecting the shipments of tobacco into neutral countries against the discriminations that are now being made against it by the warring countries of Europe. I understand that the amendment relates not only to tobacco, but to many other products of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It applies to all of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am informed that it is broad enough to apply to all. It is a very meritorious amendment.

I merely desire to call to the Senator's attention, however, the fact that several days ago the Senator and some of his colleagues on the committee singled me out alone in the Senate, and criticized me for offering an amendment to this bill. Since that time a number of other amendments have been offered by Senators on the floor without criticism coming from the Finance Committee. Those amendments have been recognized, considered, and adopted. I have no doubt that they are good, valid amendments; but, of course, I recognize that fact—and it is a fact—that there was no binding rule in the Democratic caucus against the offering of amendments. I am informed, on inquiry made of the secretary of the caucus, that there was no resolution passed broad enough to especially cover the right of the committee to inject new matter into this bill or to reverse the action of the caucus.

I merely want these statements to go into the RECORD, not in opposition to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky at all, but to show the wisdom of the Democratic caucus when it assembled in not proceeding along the lines on which the Senator from North Carolina and one of his colleagues criticized me for my action.

Suppose, under the present circumstances, the Democratic caucus had gone so far as to prohibit the Senator from Kentucky from offering this amendment; an amendment that is germane to this bill; an amendment that can probably not be passed as an independent bill at this session of Congress, with adjournment confronting us at every hour; an amendment that the Secretary of State thinks of sufficient importance to the whole country to bring before the Congress.

More than that, I am certain that the Senator from North Carolina, when he takes his sure, deliberate judgment of this schedule, will not contend for a moment that a Democratic caucus, behind closed doors, would delegate to a committee of this Senate to legislate behind closed doors, to the exclusion of the right of action of their colleagues on this floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not through.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield for a question; but I want to finish my remarks.

Mr. NELSON. It is not exactly a question which I desire to submit, but I simply wish to say to the Senator that it was unfortunate that he did not come to the Senate two years earlier, for if he had done so he would have witnessed during that period the enactment of more caucus legislation than that of which he now complains.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, under certain circumstances, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota, I do not object to caucus legislation, in so far as it is along the lines of the principles established by a party. There are times when that is the only way that a party can legislate; but it should do it in the open when it takes that responsibility, and everybody should be bound or everybody should be free. If a caucus proposes to legislate as a caucus, it must take the party responsibility before the country; it must announce its legislation and must stand on it. Then the country knows who is responsible and who is not.

I can see that it would be wise to grant to a committee having charge of a bill the power to make amendments in minor details; and that privilege is often granted, because mistakes may creep in; but to say that a party caucus should delegate to a party committee the right to inject new legislation into a bill, to reverse the action of the caucus itself, or to make important and radical changes in a bill after caucus action would be to declare that, instead of having legislation by one of the great parties in the Senate and by the membership of that great party, the right to think and the right to act is delegated to a few men and the remainder of the membership of the Senate are excluded from exercising freedom of action and freedom of thought. No party in this country could ever go to the people and stand on such an outrageous perversion of free legislative action affecting the interests of the American people.

That was not done in this instance. I am merely here to defend my party on this question. I am advised that no such action was taken. There may have been an understanding, or a resolution may have been passed to allow minor details to be amended, but there was no authority given in that caucus to reverse the action of the caucus or to propose new legislation by the committee or by anybody else, except that there was no understanding that the caucus should be binding. It was merely persuasive. There was no understanding that any committee of the Senate should have a right to legislate for the Senate, instead of the Senate legislating for itself—all of which was democratic, all of which was in accord with the great principles of the party.

The Senator from Kentucky is not violating any caucus action or any caucus principle by representing the best interests of a great constituency and proposing this legislation in their behalf.

I am not making complaint, so far as I am personally concerned, because, as relates to my action, I am always willing to act in what I believe is the interest of the people I represent, taking the responsibility myself and asking no one to share it with me.

I merely desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that the action of his committee and himself in reference to this matter, and the action of his committee and himself in reference to the reversal of the caucus action relating to the munitions tax, puts him and his colleagues who criticized me the other day on exactly the same plane on which I stood when I offered a minor amendment changing some figures in one paragraph of this bill.

I want the RECORD to show this. I think it is in the interest of the party that it should show it, because, although I realize the anxiety of the Senator from North Carolina to get his bill through, and I am heartily desirous of aiding in the speedy passage of the bill, and although I realize, because I have occupied a similar position in another body, the desire of the chairman of the committee to avoid amendments to his bill so far as possible, nevertheless he can not push that desire to a point where there is an endeavor to exclude independent thought and independent action on a great legislative matter without destroying the independence of action and thought of the Senators who represent constituencies on this floor. If that independence is going to be destroyed, as sometimes may be necessary in connection with great party measures, then it can only be done when every man is bound and the party itself stands responsible to the country in place of the responsibility of the individual Senator.

It is unspeakable to think that in the last analysis a legislative body would refer to a dozen or a half dozen members of that body the right to think and act for it. We have committees which must digest and sift legislation and prepare it for action; but to say that we have reached a point in the legislative history of this country where we are willing to delegate to committees sitting behind closed doors the only power of action, and surrender and preclude the right of men who rest under the responsibility on this floor of acting for their constituencies is in keeping with no principle the great founders of the Democratic Party ever enunciated or ever stood for.

The Democratic Party as a party, and Democratic Representatives as belonging to that party, since the beginning of the Government have stood out in front of the column as the party and as the men who claimed the right of the exercise of individual judgment and freedom of action in relation to the great constituencies they represented; and if the hour has come—which it has not—in the Senate of the United States where we have to legislate under gag rule and behind closed doors, the people of the United States will repudiate the party taking such a position. Therefore I want the RECORD now to show that the Democratic Party has not taken such a position; that there is no warrant for the claim that it stands for such a position; and that it has not attempted either to gag or suppress the individual action of Democratic Senators on the floor of the Senate.

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I do not rise to address myself to the point raised by the Senator from Alabama with respect to the merits of the Democratic caucus or as to its limitations, and so forth. I rise for another purpose, and that is to say a few words in behalf of a class of men who are not heard in this Chamber.

There is a class of railroad men—and they number many thousands—who are entitled to the consideration of the Senate to a far greater extent than are some of the men who are coming here now under a threat and asking for legislation. I refer to the great army of section men, switchmen, telegraph operators, train dispatchers, and station agents. There is no class of railroad employees who receive lower wages and, in some instances, have to work longer hours; and I trust that in whatever legislation shall be enacted granting relief to the men who are connected with the operation of our railroads the Senate will not lose sight of the rights of these men. They are really entitled to greater consideration, because they do not come here with a threat.

Look at the poor section men! I have often thought, as I was riding on trains at the rate of 40 or 50 miles an hour, how much we owe to the care and vigilance of those poor men. I do not know what they are paid in the South, but in the North the customary wages, at least in my part of the country, are in winter about a dollar and a half a day and in summer about $2 a day. Years ago, on one of our great railroads in that region, the ordinary section men only got a dollar and a quarter a day and the section boss a dollar and a half a day.

Consider the poor pay the station agents receive. Did you ever look into that question? They get a small monthly salary at the ordinary railway station. They are compelled, in order to provide for themselves and their families, to perform service for the telegraph company, in places where the telegraph company has no office of its own. They also have to attend to the express business. For all of that extra work, in addition to their regular work for the railroad company, where they have to act not only as ticket agents but as baggage-masters and men of all work, they get only a small pittance in the way of wages. At the ordinary country stations their wages, with the little extras for attending to the telegraph, express business, and so forth, may run from $50 to $100, or in some cases to $125 a month. I do not refer to the larger stations.

Then take the switchmen, who have most hazardous and difficult work to perform, and who have as much to do as any class of operators with the movement of trains and the safety of the traveling public. Take the boys at the switchboards, the boys who are sending the telegrams of the country. They are all compelled to work long hours, and they receive most scanty wages. Take the train dispatchers—another deserving and hard-working class of men who are entitled to our consideration. These men are not here in any threatening attitude demanding relief, but I most earnestly and sincerely hope that they will receive the consideration of the Senate to an equal extent with the other class of railroad men in whose behalf legislation is being urged.

I am not hostile to the laboring men. I started my own life in the lowest dregs of poverty, and had a hard struggle in my early days. My sympathies have always gone out to the laboring men; and yet, I thank God, that, although I am far from being a rich man, although I was brought up in poverty, I have never had any prejudice or hostility toward the wealthy men or the capitalists of this country.

Let us look the question squarely in the face. What is there in this eight-hour proposition? Those who are now clamoring for it do not mean that they want to work only eight hours. That is not the proposition, for in the next breath they say: "We want time and a half for all extra time." They are quite willing to work extra time. So that is not the trouble. What they want is not a limitation of eight hours a day on their work, but they want us to give them the same pay for 8 hours that they have been in the habit of getting for 10 hours, or that they get for what is termed "a run."

We know the fact that on many trains, especially on passenger trains, the train crews make their runs in four or five or six hours, and for this service they get pay for a full day's work.

That is the case not only with passenger trains, but with fast freight trains, cattle trains, and trains carrying perishable goods. The class of trains whose crews, I think, are being treated with the greatest injustice are the local freight trains, which have from 100 to 150 miles to go in a day and have to stop at every intermediate station to pick up and discharge freight. Those men have long hours of work, oftentimes 16, 18, or 20 hours a day, and I think they are clearly entitled to relief.

Mr. President, I am not hostile to remedial legislation by any means; but whatever we do, Senators, let us not forget this great army of unorganized railroad men—switchmen, section men, telegraph operators, and station agents. While providing for their more fortunate brethren let us not lose sight of those deserving men. Let us give them some relief; for they come here, if I may use the expression, in a good spirit without any threats, invoking our help and aid in this matter.

In this connection, Mr. President, I wish to read a telegram I have received, and then I will suspend. I have been waiting all the morning to get a chance to read it. The telegram is as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., August 30, 1916.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
Washington, D. C.:

In the name of 5,000 business men from every district in Minnesota I wish to voice protest against favorable action on the proposed measure fixing the hours of labor for railroad employees at eight hours per day. Our reason for making this protest is that we believe that such action will result in necessitating a material increase in railroad rates to meet the threatened strike of railroad employees. By arbitrarily imposing this increased burden upon the people of the country would, we believe, be an injustice, and no such action should be taken without a thorough investigation of the question. A reply would be appreciated.

MINNESOTA EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION,
GEORGE M. GILLETTE, President.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 15774) entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

THE REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire, nor do I propose, to enter into any controversy with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] about the caucus. I think quite enough has been said about that, and I do not myself desire to say anything further about it. All I shall say about it now is to justify the action of the committee in accepting the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. President, this is not the first caucus we have had. We had a caucus upon the tariff bill of 1913. It was quite an extensive caucus. The items of the bill were pretty thoroughly discussed. After that caucus adjourned, having declared the bill to be a party measure, various and sundry amendments were offered, some of them referred to the committee, some of them offered upon the floor of the Senate when the item to which they related was reached. I do not think anybody questioned the right of the committee, when an amendment was referred to it after the caucus had adjourned, to give consideration to that amendment and, when it was reached upon the floor of the Senate, to express the conclusion of the committee. Of course, that particular amendment was not the subject of caucus action, and nobody would be bound by the action of the committee in rejecting it or in recommending it. It was a new matter.

I have been speaking of the tariff bill. Exactly the same course was pursued with reference to the shipping bill, which had been made a party matter. When an amendment was offered upon the floor of the Senate and not referred to the committee, the chairman of the committee, without any dissent, without any objection from anybody, either said that the committee approved or that the committee disapproved. That action was not covered by caucus, and the action of the committee was merely recommendatory, and no Democratic Senator was bound by it.

Mr. President, on the 29th of August the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] offered this amendment. It was referred to the committee. The caucus had taken no action about it. The committee did not think because the caucus had taken no action about this matter that its hands were tied, that it could not recommend action by the Senate, or that it could not recommend nonaction by the Senate. I do not think anybody heretofore has ever contended that the committee was so bound by caucus action that it could not act upon an amendment subsequently referred to it or subsequently introduced; but of course it is clear that the action of the committee in that respect would not have the same binding force as its action with reference to amendments that were in the bill at the time it was considered in the caucus. The committee is not contending and I, as chairman, am not contending that any Democrat or anybody else is bound in any way by the acceptance of this amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I presented this amendment after consultation with the various farmers' organizations and dealers in tobacco of the tobacco-growing States of Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, Maryland, and North Carolina that assembled here the first part of the week. I called their attention to the fact that in the pending bill there was a provision—section 102—which reads as follows:

That whenever any country, dependency, or colony shall prohibit the importation of any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States and not injurious to health or morals, the President, within his discretion, shall have power to prohibit, during the period such prohibition is in force, the importation into the United States of similar articles, or in case the United States does not import similar articles from that country, then other articles, the products of such country, dependency, or colony.

I suggested to these organizations that perhaps that section would give to the tobacco growers of these States some relief against the embargo or the contraband order issued by Great Britain against the tobacco produced in these States and in this country going into other countries.

But at a conference of the committee appointed—consisting of Senator MARTIN, Senator SWANSON, and myself, and Representative HULL and Representative FLOOD—with the State Department we discovered that this amendment was not sufficient, in that it only made provision against keeping articles out of their own countries but not other countries, and therefore the pending amendment was prepared and submitted by me to the Senate. I will say that this amendment has the approval of the State Department and my colleagues from the tobacco-producing States.

The moving force that brought all of these gentlemen from these various States to the Capital was that Great Britain had said a year or more ago that tobacco was not contraband, and the farmers, with that understanding and agreement, and faithfully relying upon the same, planted large crops of tobacco. But at the very time when this tobacco is being housed and made ready for sale Great Britain issues an order making it contraband of war, and by this she puts herself and her allies in this market as the only purchasers, forbidding the shipment of tobacco to neutral and other countries, in violation of the law of nations.

The amendment that I have presented gives to this Government the right to protect the products of its soil and factories against the unlawful conduct of other Governments that discriminate against us by saying to them: "If you are going to prohibit our products which are not contraband of war—if you are going to do this in violation of law and contrary to the practice of nations—then we empower our Government to retaliate by prohibiting or restricting articles of your commerce from coming into this country."

Our country is neutral and is living up faithfully to the laws of nations, and we intend to protect the products of our soil and industry when unlawfully attacked by other countries. The farmers who grow tobacco feel, and they have a perfect right to feel, that they have been unfairly dealt with by Great Britain. If she intended to forbid shipment of tobacco to Holland, and through her to the central powers, she should have said so, and not have removed tobacco from the contraband list, and by that act say, in effect, to the growers: "Plant and grow tobacco; your market will remain as before—open to the world."

This is a great and just Government, and I know its duty here is plain, and that is to protect these patriotic, hard-working tillers of the soil, and this amendment offers that opportunity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. JAMES. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have read the amendment hurriedly. I assume that it covers practically all the exportations from this country of the products of our soil, tobacco being one article; but it is much broader than that, I assume?

Mr. JAMES. It says:

Any article the product of the soil or industry of the United States.

It includes all products in the United States. I was merely pointing out the one single item of tobacco, where 3,000,000 people in this country rely upon it as their money crop, who had in good faith relied upon the action of Great Britain and had grown tobacco. Of course, tobacco is purchased by France and by Italy in a governmental way; they have a Government monopoly of it. So they feel that they can step in here and say that you can ship tobacco to us, but you shall not ship tobacco into any neutral or other European country. They make themselves the only purchaser, and they will be enabled to beat down the price of the product of these toiling men of America, who are entitled to a free market, unhampered and unmonopolized. This action would cost the tobacco growers of the United States $50,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. My attention has been called to two instances where manufactured goods were shipped from my own State to either Sweden or Norway and Great Britain took possession of them. I think possibly they were released afterwards, but they assumed the right to prevent the exportation of the goods on the ground that they might reach Germany.

Mr. JAMES. This gives protection in a case of that kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. I hope it does.

Mr. JAMES. It does undoubtedly. Mr. President, by the introduction of this amendment I do not want to get into the controversy here with my friends the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. There seems really to be none. This amendment is in keeping with the spirit of a provision that has been passed on by the caucus. It is an elaboration, but a very important elaboration and a necessary elaboration of it. After I introduced the amendment it was referred to the Finance Committee, of which I am a member, and it has the approval of that committee. Then I took the precaution to consult with all my Democratic colleagues on this side, with the possible exception of one or two. Each one of them told me he was in favor of the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. President, I believe it is unnecessary to discuss this question further, and I hope we shall have a vote upon it if no one desires to be heard on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire in connection with the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to have inserted in the RECORD the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the Matamoras cases during the Civil War, in which England herself made objection to what she is now doing in prohibiting the shipment of noncontraband goods to neutral countries. The decision was given by the Chief Justice of the United States and stated the law of nations clearly and completely. I do not wish to read it, but desire to have it printed in the RECORD, to show the absolute and unwarranted action of Great Britain in prohibiting the shipment of tobacco and noncontraband goods to neutral countries. Britain's action in this respect is in gross violation of every principle of international law. This Government should firmly maintain its rights and not submit to such illegal dictation. This measure enables this Government promptly and efficiently to retaliate in order to maintain our rights. I desire to insert here the decision of our Supreme Court upon this matter, granting to Britain rights she now refuses to us. It is contained in Moore's Digest of International Law:

MATAMORAS CASES.

The Mexican town of Matamoras, situated on the Rio Grande, nearly opposite Brownsville, in Texas, which formed one of the Confederate States, offered obvious advantages as a base of contraband trade.

The steamer Peterhoff was captured February 25, 1863, near the island of St. Thomas, Danish West Indies, by the U. S. S. Vanderbilt, and was condemned by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, together with her cargo, for attempt to break the blockade. From this sentence an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court.

The Peterhoff was fully documented as a British merchant steamer upon a voyage, as shown by her manifest, shipping list, clearances, and other papers, from London, England, to Matamoras, in Mexico. The bills of lading all stipulated for the delivery of the goods "off the Rio Grande, Gulf of Mexico, for Matamoras," adding that they were to be taken from alongside the ship, provided that lighters could cross the bar at the mouth of the river. The cargo was miscellaneous and shipped by different persons, all but one of whom were British subjects, and a part of it belonged to the owner of the vessel. Of the numerous packages a certain number contained articles useful for military purposes during war. Among them were 36 cases of artillery harness, 14,450 pairs of "Blucher" boots, 5,580 pairs of "Government regulation gray blankets," 95 casks of horseshoes of large size, suitable for cavalry service, and 52,000 horseshoe nails. There were also considerable amounts of iron, steel, shovels, spades, blacksmiths' bellows and anvils, nails, and leather, and an assorted lot of drugs—1,000 pounds of calomel, large quantities of morphine, 265 pounds of chloroform, and 2,640 ounces of quinine. Owing to the blockade of the coast, drugs, and especially quinine, were greatly needed in the Southern States.

With the exception of a portion consigned to the order of the master, which belonged to the owners of the vessel, the cargo was represented in agency or consigneeship chiefly by three different persons on board the vessel as passengers—Redgate, Bowden, and Almond—all natives of Great Britain, and at the time of the capture all British subjects, except Redgate, who had become a citizen of the United States, and who before the outbreak of the war resided in Texas. He stated that at the time of the capture he intended to establish a mercantile house at Matamoras, and that had his "goods arrived there they were to take the chances of the market." Bowden and Almond testified to substantially the same effect as to their respective ventures. During the war Matamoras, which lies on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, nearly opposite the town of Brownsville, in Texas, had, by reason of the facilities which as a neutral port it offered for trade with the Confederacy, whose seaports were all blockaded, suddenly risen from the position of a place of no importance "into a great center of commercial activity, rivaling the trade of New York or Liverpool."

The opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of the Peterhoff was delivered by Chief Justice Chase. He stated that the record satisfied the court that the voyage of the ship "was not simulated." She was "in the proper course of a voyage from London to Matamoras"; nor was there any evidence which fairly warranted the belief "that the cargo had any other direct destination." The proposed delivery of the cargo off the mouth of the Rio Grande into lighters for Matamoras was "in the usual course of trade," since it was impossible for a vessel of heavy draft to enter the river. "It is true," said the court, "that by these lighters some of the cargo might be conveyed directly to the blockaded coast, but there is no evidence which warrants us in saying that such conveyance was intended by the master or the shippers. We dismiss, therefore, from consideration the claim, suggested rather than urged in behalf of the Government, that the ship and cargo, both or either, were destined for the blockaded coast."

But is was maintained in argument by counsel for the captors (1) that trade with Matamoras was, at the time of the capture, made unlawful by the blockade of the mouth of the Rio Grande; and, if this was not the case, (2) that the ulterior destination of the cargo was Texas and the other States in rebellion, and that this ulterior destination constituted a breach of the blockade.

On these points the court held:

1. That "the mouth of the Rio Grande was not included in the blockade of the ports of the rebel States, and that neutral commerce with Matamoras, except in contraband, was entirely free."

2. That "neutral trade to or from a blockaded country by inland navigation or transportation" is lawful; and "therefore that trade between London and Matamoras, even with intent to supply from Matamoras goods to Texas, violated no blockade, and can not be declared unlawful." "Such trade," said the court, "with unrestricted inland commerce between such a port and the enemy's territory, impairs undoubtedly, and very seriously impairs, the value of a blockade of the enemy's coast. But in cases such as that now in judgment we administer the public law of nations, and are not at liberty to inquire what is for the particular advantage or disadvantage of our own or another country."

The question of breach of blockade being thus excluded, the court proceeded to consider the question of the destination of the cargo in connection with the question of contraband. Taking up the usual classification of articles with reference to this question—(1) those used primarily for purposes of war, (2) those used for purposes of war or of peace according to circumstances, and (3) those used exclusively for peaceful purposes—the court observed that a considerable part of the cargo was of the third class and need not be further considered. A large part, perhaps, was of the second class, but as it was "not proved * * * to have been actually destined to belligerent use," it therefore could not, said the court, "be treated as contraband. Another portion was, in our judgment," continued the court, "destined directly to the rebel military service. This portion of the cargo consisted of the cases of artillery harness, and of articles described in the invoices as 'men's army bluchers,' 'artillery boots,' and 'Government regulation gray blankets.' These goods come fairly under the description of goods primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war. They make part of the necessary equipment of an army."

With regard to these articles, which were adjudged to be condemned as contraband, the language of the court is to be specially noted.

"It is true that even these goods," said the court, "if really intended for sale in the market of Matamoras, would be free of liability, for contraband may be transported by neutrals to a neutral port, if intended to make part of its general stock in trade. But there is nothing in the case which tends to convince us that such was their real destination, while all the circumstances indicate that these articles, at least, were destined for the use of the rebel forces then occupying Brownsville and other places in the vicinity.

"And contraband merchandise is subject to a different rule in respect to ulterior destination than that which applies to merchandise not contraband. The latter is liable to capture only when a violation of blockade is intended; the former when destined to the hostile country or to the actual military or naval use of the enemy, whether blockaded or not. * * * Hence, while articles, not contraband, might be sent to Matamoras and beyond to the rebel region where the communications were not interrupted by blockade, articles of a contraband character destined, in fact, to a State in rebellion, or for the use of the rebel military forces, were liable to capture though primarially destined to Matamoras. We are obliged to conclude that the portion of the cargo which we have characterized as contraband must be condemned."

Restitution of the ship was decreed on payment of costs and expenses. This condition was imposed, notwithstanding the finding that her destination was neutral, (1) because the master, when brought to by the Vanderbilt, refused to send his papers on board; (2) because papers were destroyed on board the ship at the time of the capture; and (3) because it was the duty of the captors, since contraband was found on board "destined to the enemy," to bring the ship in for adjudication. (The Peterhoff (1866), 5 Wall., 28.)

In two other Matamoras cases decided at the same term, the Supreme Court decreed restitution in the absence of proof of actual enemy destination. The first of these was that of the Science. Chief Justice Chase, delivering the opinion of the court, stated that the evidence was "clear that the vessel and her outward cargo were neutral property, destined to neutral consignees at Matamoras, and that the cargo had been actually delivered as consigned." "Some of the proof," the court added, "tended to show that a portion of this cargo consisted of Confederate uniform cloth, but there was none showing destination to enemy territory or immediate enemy use. There was, therefore, nothing in the character of the vessel or of the outward cargo which warrants condemnation." (The Science, 5 Wall., 178.)

At the same time the court decided the case of the Volant, another Matamoras case. The Chief Justice, delivering the opinion, stated that the proof showed that the vessel was the property of a neutral merchant of the island of Jersey, documented as a British merchantman, and regularly cleared from London to Matamoras. The cargo was shipped by the charterers of the vessel for neutral owners, and consigned to neutrals at Matamoras, but had not been discharged at the time of capture. "It consisted," said the court, "in part, of bales of Confederate uniform cloth, of the same mark and of corresponding numbers with like goods found on the Science, but there is no proof of unlawful destination." The decree of the court below, condemning the ship and cargo, was accordingly reversed. (The Volant, 5 Wall., 179.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment on page 6, which was passed over, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. There is an amendment pending on page 6, where the Senate reconsidered the vote by which the amendment of the committee embraced in lines 12 to 17 was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The amendment to the amendment was passed over until to-day at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who desired time to look into the matter. He notified me this morning that he has no further objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In the same connection it will be necessary to modify two other amendments in the bill, but as the action just taken by the Senate will carry it to conference, I think it is a satisfactory disposition of the matter for the present to allow the other amendments to stand.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, the decision of Great Britain to return to the protective-tariff system has demonstrated the impracticability of free trade, or a tariff for revenue only, under existing national conditions. Free trade assumes just and fair treatment between nations; it assumes natural and normal competition; it assumes that the principle of free competition is a sufficient regulator of economic conduct. Free trade never contemplated that a nation would adopt the policy of obtaining control of the raw materials of the world, which lie at the basis of all industries, and by so doing acquire a monopoly both of the raw materials and of the industries upon which they are dependent. Free trade never contemplated that a nation would organize its industries, with the aid of the Government, into vast syndicates, with the avowed purpose of dumping its products upon foreign countries at any price which would effectually destroy foreign competition and foreign industries. I quote the following from a recent work on Industrial Progress of Germany:

> The coke syndicate sells coke in Austria at $2.50 per ton cheaper than at home. The wire-nail syndicate furnishes its product to foreign customers for $33 per ton, while the price for the same goods in the domestic markets is $62.50 per ton. The sugar syndicate, which was formed in 1900, and controls 98 per cent of the production, has fixed the price of beet sugar at $3.93 per hundredweight in Germany and at $2.97 per hundredweight abroad.

From the standpoint of those who believe in the theory of free trade experience has shown that it can not safely be adopted until the nations have reached a higher ethical standard of international commerce. Under modern trade conditions free trade is dead. Under modern trade conditions the safety and welfare of every nation imperatively demand economic independence, secured in the only way in which it can be secured—through a protective tariff. Every economic theory must be tried by actual experience, by its application to existing social conditions, and if it fails in this supreme test the theory, however logical in form, is not sound, because it is not based upon all the facts which enter into the problem.

Mr. President, the chambers of commerce of Great Britain, comprising more than 30,000 manufacturers, merchants, professional men, and traders in all parts of the United Kingdom, recently passed the following resolutions:

> This association desires to place on record for the guidance of those who follow us in days to come its firm conviction, based on experience of war, that the strength and safety of the Empire lies in ability to produce what it requires as largely as may be possible from its own soil and factories.

Then follows this language:

> Production within the Empire is of vital importance. Power of production must come before exchange of commodities. * * * By our present system of free access to our markets for foreign producers, * * * and in many other ways, there has been no recognition of the fact that production at home is infinitely preferable to the purchase of goods abroad, even at a slightly reduced price. * * * What we need is that we should be more self-sustaining and produce more, so as to improve the status of our population.

The sentiments here expressed voice practically the unanimous opinion of the United Kingdom.

Great Britain places her abandonment of free trade on the grounds of national safety and national welfare. Her position is that conditions require a change from an economic system which ignores the safety and welfare of the people to one which regards these things as vital. She maintains that commerce and national safety are inseparable, and that each nation must be made economically independent through a system of protective duties on foreign imports. This does not mean prohibitive duties but duties high enough to protect home industries, home agriculture, home raw materials, and home labor. Great Britain now realizes that she was mistaken in the fundamental assumption on which the whole doctrine of free trade rests, namely, that nations will treat one another fairly and justly.

It was Germany's aggressive protective policy which has broken down free trade in England. Great Britain complains of Germany's "commercial penetration" and "predatory commercial methods." She charges Germany with the attempt "by surreptitious methods" to acquire a monopoly of raw materials and of the industries of which they form the base; and she arraigns Germany's trade policy of dumping goods on the English market. These unfair practices have convinced Great Britain of the necessity of a protective tariff.

Some 40 years ago Great Britain and Germany started on the race for the commerce of the world. The rival economic theories of free trade and protection were here put to the supreme test. Great Britain at the outset had the great advantage of age, wealth, and commercial supremacy. As the result of this contest, Great Britain now admits the economic domination of Germany, and that her national security, if not her very existence, depends upon her adoption of a protective policy.

Mr. President, free trade has had a comparatively short life. Adam Smith's book was published in 1776, but it was not until 70 years later, in 1846, that Great Britain repealed the corn laws under the exceptional conditions then existing, such as the famine in Ireland. Upon this point Dicey, the English publicist, says:

* * * Add to all this that the Irish famine made the suspension of the corn laws a patent necessity. * * * What, however, weighed with most Englishmen, above every other consideration, was the harmony of the doctrine that commerce ought to be free, with that disbelief in the benefits of State intervention which, in 1846, had been gaining ground for more than a generation.

Through Cobden's influence with Napoleon III, France materially reduced her tariff in 1860. In Italy, Cavour sympathized with the English school of economists, and the German States also adopted a more liberal trade policy.

But in 1870 a reaction against free trade set in under the leadership of Bismarck, and this reaction has continued until all the great commercial nations have become protectionists. The agitation on this question in Germany culminated in 1879 when, following several years of commercial depression, she adopted a highly protective tariff. In urging the passage of this act, and the improbability of any further free-trade extension, Bismarck said:

The only exception is England, and that will not last long. France and America have both completely forsaken that direction. Austria, instead of reducing its protective duties, has increased them; Russia has done the same. * * * Therefore no one can expect Germany to remain permanently the dupe of an honest conviction. Hitherto the wide-opened gates of our imports have made us the dumping place of all the overproduction of foreign countries. At present they can deposit everything with us * * * and it is the surfeiting of Germany with the overproduction of other lands which most depresses our prices and checks the development of our industry and the restoration of our economic condition. * * * Let us see that we at any rate preserve the German market * * * for German industry. * * *

This reaction in favor of protection led by Germany spread over Europe. Russia, France, and Austria increased their duties in 1881 and 1882. England alone remained steadfast to free trade. But the history of Germany during the following 35 years has convinced Great Britain that free trade is impossible under modern trade conditions.

Mr. President, the acknowledged purpose of the Underwood bill, which became a law in October, 1913, was to destroy in a large degree the existing protective tariff and thus to open up our home market to foreign competition; and it certainly accomplished its purpose until the embargo on commerce caused by the European war. The only reason why the protective duties were not entirely removed was the fear that it would create too great a dislocation in business. The distinguished Senator from Alabama, from whom the bill takes its name, and the party which he so ably represents, are by tradition and conviction free traders; they do not believe in the principle of protection. And it may be said that the issue of free trade or protection has been the main issue which has divided the two great parties of the country for the last half century. But to-day all the leading nations are against this Democratic doctrine, and even Great Britain, the founder, promoter, and champion of free trade, has found the theory impracticable under modern trade conditions and is preparing to rebuild her economic edifice with protection as its foundation, so that she may meet Germany and other nations on equal terms in the markets of the world. All that is now left of free trade in the civilized world is the Democratic Party, and it would seem from some provisions in this bill that it is about to change its faith.

Mr. President, the antidumping provisions in the pending revenue bill are manifestly inadequate to meet the trade situation which will arise after the war. A new and complicated statute of this kind relating to trade practices could only be enforced through the courts in some specific instances and after long delay. We have had some experience with statutes of this nature in the history of the Sherman Act. It is impossible to arrest by a law of this kind the flood of foreign importations which will follow the declaration of peace. The subject is too large to be dealt with in this manner. It is by protective duties alone that we can safeguard our home market and our own industries against the importations which are sure to follow the end of the war. Both the allies and the central powers are alive to the situation, and they are contemplating heroic measures to keep their own trade on the return of peace. We also must meet this emergency by ample protection. I approve of a tariff commission, but I doubt whether any tariff commission which Congress may authorize could act quickly enough to meet the post bellum conditions which will confront us. No one knows how soon the war may end. In the present emergency I believe that Congress should pass a new protective-tariff act as soon as possible, with or without the aid of a tariff commission, which will give full protection to our home market and thus make secure the prosperity and welfare of the American people.

Mr. President, the necessity for national defense in all its branches rests upon the fundamental fact that nations are now dominated by the impulse of nationality. Mankind is enslaved by national consciousness. While this impulse continues to dominate the nations of the world it is imperative that we should be prepared physically by an army and navy adequate for all defensive purposes, and economically by a tariff adequate to the full protection of our commerce and industries.

We may hope that some time in the future this dominating spirit of nationality may be extended to embrace humanity. We may hope that the time may come when all the civilized nations of the world, like our 48 States, shall form a real partnership "based on the recognition of equal rights, established and enforced by a common will." We may then possibly dispense with armies and navies and protective duties, but that time has not yet arrived. We are still in the national stage of civilization. We have not yet advanced to the international stage. That stage will not be reached until this intense national feeling is changed for something higher; until nations, like our own States in forming the Union, are willing to surrender part of their sovereignty for some kind of an international federation; until the rule of law is substituted for the rule of force; until we have something stronger and better to bind the nations together than a body of customary rules, treaties, and alliances. Until that time arrives we must be prepared to defend the Nation against every form of aggression, physical or economic.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Husting	Overman	Smith, Md.
Borah	James	Owen	Smoot
Brady	Jones	Penrose	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Phelan	Stone
Chilton	Kern	Pittman	Swanson
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Reed	Taggart
Colt	Lea, Tenn	Saulsbury	Thomas
Dillingham	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Thompson
du Pont	McCumber	Sheppard	Underwood
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Vardaman
Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, it was not my intention originally——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota if he will not let us go on with the bill for 10 or 15 minutes. There are some matters in which Senators who have to be away from the Chamber are interested, and they are anxious to have them acted upon. I do not think that will take more than 15 minutes.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly; that will be very agreeable to me, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now take up Title III, beginning on page 71 of the bill, being the munition manufacturer's tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Secretary will begin the reading of the bill at that point.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the heading, "Title III—Munition manufacturers' tax," on page 71, line 19, to change the number of the section from "200" to "40."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 20, after the word "term," to strike out "person" and insert "corporation"; in the same line, after the word "includes," to strike out "partnerships"; and, in line 21, after the word "corporations," to insert "joint-stock companies," so as to make the clause read:

The term "corporation" includes corporations, joint-stock companies, and associations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado why the word "person" and the word "partnerships" were stricken out?

Mr. THOMAS. Because persons and partnerships are subjected to a surtax on incomes, and if they were also subjected to the special excise tax provided for by this title the total amount of the tax would be out of all proportion to what it should be.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, corporations and joint-stock companies are also taxed under the bill at the rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. But corporations and joint-stock companies are not subject to the surtax, but only to the normal tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, the normal tax is 2 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. The normal tax is 2 per cent, but in addition to the normal tax individuals pay, as the Senator knows, surtaxes in proportion to the amount of their income.

Mr. SMOOT. And in addition to the 2 per cent tax on corporations they also have to pay 50 cents for each $1,000 of capital stock and surplus.

Mr. THOMAS. There is a difference of 2½ per cent for corporations as against individuals of large incomes who pay surtax in addition as high as 12 and 13 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see why there is any difference between a partnership producing munitions of war and selling them to a manufacturer, and a company doing the same thing.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Utah asked me for the reason, and I have given it. It may not be satisfactory, but that is the reason.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason, of course, as the Senator says, why the Democratic Party has made the change.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the House of Representatives in passing the bill displayed a great deal more wisdom in inserting the terms "person" and "partnerships" than has the Senate committee in proposing to strike them out; but that is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the Senator from Utah is entitled to his opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 71, after line 21, to strike out:

The term "manufacture" and its derivatives, except as used in section 201, include the terms "smelt," "refine," "alloy," and their derivatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 7, to strike out:

SEC. 201. That every person manufacturing gunpowder or other explosives shall pay for each taxable year an excise tax equivalent to the following percentages of the gross receipts during such year from the sale or disposition of such explosives manufactured in the United States, except blasting powder and dynamite:

Five per cent of the amount of such receipts not in excess of $1,000,000; and

Eight per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $1,000,000.

Every person manufacturing (a) cartridges, loaded or unloaded, caps or primers; or (b) projectiles, shells, or torpedoes of any kind, including shrapnel, loaded or unloaded, or fuses; or (c) firearms of any kind, including small arms, cannons, machine guns, rifles, and bayonets; or (d) any parts of any of the articles mentioned in (a), (b), or (c), shall pay for each taxable year an excise tax equivalent to the following percentages of the gross receipts during such year from the sale or disposition of any such articles manufactured in the United States:

Two per cent of the amount of such receipts not in excess of $250,000;

Three per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $250,000 and do not exceed $500,000;

Four per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $500,000 and do not exceed $1,000,000; and

Five per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $1,000,000.

Every person smelting copper ore or copper concentrates, refining metallic copper, or alloying copper, shall pay for each taxable year an excise tax equivalent to the following percentages of the gross receipts during such year from the sale or disposition of refined copper or copper alloys and from the sale or disposition of crude or unrefined copper if sold or disposed of for any purpose except for refining or alloying:

One per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $25,000 and do not exceed $1,000,000;

Two per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $1,000,000 and do not exceed $10,000,000; and

Three per cent of the amount by which such receipts exceed $10,000,000.

SEC. 202. If any person during any taxable year or part thereof, whether under any agreement, arrangement, or understanding, or otherwise, sells or disposes of any such article at less than the fair market price obtainable therefor, either (a) in such manner as directly or indirectly to benefit such person or any person directly or indirectly interested in the business of such person, or (b) with intent to cause such benefit, the amount of the gross receipts of such person during such year or part thereof from the sale or disposition of such article shall be taken to be the amount which would have been received from the sale or disposition of such article if sold at the fair market price.

SEC. 203. That if the net profit derived during such year from the sale or disposition of such articles manufactured in the United States is less than 10 per cent no tax shall be levied, collected, and paid; and if the payment of the tax would reduce such net profit below 10 per cent the tax to be levied, collected, and paid shall be equal to the net profit in excess of 10 per cent. Such net profit shall be computed on the amount actually invested in the United States in the manufacture of such articles, making reasonable allowance, in the case of the increase or decrease of such amount during the taxable year, for the proportion of such year during which such increased or decreased amount has been employed in the manufacture of such articles.

In cases where such person has undivided capital invested in the manufacture of the articles specified in section 201 and of other articles, the amount invested in the manufacture of the articles specified in section 201 shall be considered as in the same ratio to the total amount invested as the gross receipts from the sale and disposition of such articles bear to the total gross receipts from the sale and disposition of all articles manufactured.

The duty of establishing to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the fact that the net profit is less than 10 per cent or that the payment of the tax would reduce the net profit below 10 per cent shall devolve upon the person subject to the tax.

SEC. 204. That when used in this title the term "net profit" means the aggregate gross receipts during the taxable year from the sale and disposition of such articles manufactured in the United States less the following items, or the proportionate part thereof chargeable to the manufacture of such articles, any deductions not kept separate from similar items arising in connection with the joint manufacture of other articles not specified in section 201 being ascertained according to the ratio above prescribed for the determination of the amount invested:

(a) The cost of raw materials entering into the manufacture;

(b) Running expenses, including rentals, cost of repairs and maintenance, heat, power, insurance, management, salaries, and wages;

(c) Interest paid within the taxable year on debts or loans contracted to meet the needs of the business, and the proceeds of which have been actually used to meet such needs;

(d) Taxes of all kinds paid during the taxable year with respect to the business or property relating to the manufacture;

(e) Losses actually sustained within the taxable year in connection with the business of manufacturing such articles, including losses from fire, flood, storm, or other casualty, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise; and

(f) A reasonable allowance, according to the conditions peculiar to each concern, for amortization of the values of buildings and machinery, account being taken of the exceptional depreciation of special plants.

SEC. 205. Any person manufacturing any of the articles specified in section 201 through the agency of a subsidiary concern or of a subcontractor, shall, for the purposes of this title, be deemed the manufacturer of such articles, instead of the subsidiary concern or the subcontractor.

SEC. 206. Every person manufacturing in the United States any of the articles mentioned in section 201 shall, on or before February 1 of each year, make a return under oath to the collector of internal revenue of the district wherein the principal office or place of business in the United States is located, stating the amount of gross receipts from the sale and disposition of such articles during the preceding taxable year. All such returns shall be transmitted forthwith by the collector to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall, on or before March 1, notify the person making such return of the amount of tax for which such person is liable, and such person shall pay the tax to the collector on or before April 1.

SEC. 207. The tax may be assessed on any person for the time being owning or carrying on the business or on any person acting as agent for that person in carrying on the business, or, where a business has ceased, on the person who owned or carried on the business or acted as agent in carrying on the business immediately before the time at which the business ceased.

SEC. 208. No person employed by the United States shall communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any information obtained under the provisions of this title or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any return furnished under the provisions of this title.

SEC. 209. Whoever violates this title or the regulations made thereunder, or knowingly makes a false statement in any return, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, shall, in addition to paying any tax to which liable, fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 210. All administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment and collection of taxes, not heretofore specifically repealed are hereby made to apply to this title so far as applicable and not inconsistent with its provisions.

SEC 211. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 41. (1) That every corporation manufacturing (a) gunpowder and other explosives; (b) cartridges, loaded and unloaded, caps or primers; (c) projectiles, shells, or torpedoes of any kind, including shrapnel, loaded or unloaded, or fuses, or complete rounds of ammunition; (d) firearms of any kind and appendages, including small arms, cannon machine guns, rifles, and bayonets; (e) electric motor boats, submarine or submersible vessels or boats; (f) any part of any of the articles mentioned in (b), (c), (d), or (e); shall pay for each taxable year an excise tax of 10 per cent upon its entire net profits actually received or accrued for said year from the sale or disposition of such articles manufactured within the United States.

(2) And every corporation selling to or manufacturing for any corporation mentioned in paragraph (1) any material entering into and used as a component part in the manufacture of any of the articles enumerated in (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), or (f), shall pay for each taxable year an excise tax of 5 per cent upon its net profits actually received or accrued for said year from the sale or disposition of such material so entering into or used as a component part in the manufacture in the United States of the articles so enumerated as aforesaid.

(3) This section shall cease to be of effect at the end of one year after the termination of the present European war, which shall be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States declaring said war to have ended.

Mr. THOMAS. After the word "explosives," on line 23 of the amendment, the committee offers the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed on behalf of the committee by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 23, after the word "explosives," it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting:

Excepting blasting powder and dynamite used for industrial purposes and powder used for sporting purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 79, in line 9, after the name "United States," on behalf of the committee I move the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, line 9, after the name "United States," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further That no such corporation shall be subject to tax upon net profits received during the year 1916 derived from the sale and delivery of the articles enumerated in this section under contract executed and solely performed by said corporations prior to January 1, 1916.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator address himself to the proposed amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. It does not make any difference. I want to ask the Senator about another amendment, which may be allied to this amendment. On line 23, page 78, occur the words "cartridges, loaded and unloaded, caps or primers." Would there be any objection to amending the amendment by inserting the words "except those used for sporting purposes"? A very large number of cartridges are so used.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that that is an excellent suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator will not object to the amendment. It is in line with the other amendments which he has proposed in the preceding line.

Mr. SMOOT. If the exception is made as to sporting purposes, then, of course, it must be made in relation to their use in mining.

Mr. THOMAS. In relation to explosives used industrially. On behalf of the committee, I will accept both of those suggestions of amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. After the word "primers," I move to insert "except those used for sporting purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, line 24, after the word "primers," it is proposed to insert "except those used for sporting purposes."

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest that the amendment to the amendment read "exclusive of those used for commercial and sporting purposes."

Mr. PENROSE. That is right.

Mr. OVERMAN. "Used exclusively for."

Mr. THOMAS. No; it should read "exclusive of those used for"——

Mr. PENROSE. Cartridges are used in mining operations, of course, and when so used they ought to be excepted.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. I apprehend the suggestion of both the amendments, and I think that the proposed amendment covers it.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that the word "commercial" may be too broad, and I think, if he will use the exact language——

Mr. THOMAS. Well, use the word "industrially" instead of "commercially."

Mr. PENROSE. "Industrially" is the word.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator that if the language suggested does not cover the object which is designed, we can change it so as to make it do so.

Mr. STONE. The matter will go to conference.

Mr. THOMAS. It will go to conference, at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, line 24, after the word "primers," it is proposed to insert "exclusive of those used for industrial and sporting purposes."

Mr. STONE. Did the Secretary say "industrial and sporting purposes"?

Mr. SIMMONS. It should be "industrial or sporting purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment as proposed to be modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 78, line 24, after the word "primers," it is proposed to insert "exclusive of those used for industrial or sporting purposes."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I move to amend the amendment by striking out paragraph 2, beginning in line 10 and going down to line 19, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I was the chairman of a subcommittee which had this title relating to "munition manufacturers' tax," with other titles, under special consideration. The subcommittee was composed of the Senator from New Jersey, now occupying the chair [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and myself.

Mr. President, the immediate question now presented was a much-controverted subject when the subcommittee was considering the munitions-tax proposition. I am not now speaking alone of subsection 2, but of the whole subject of taxation on war munitions as embodied in section 41. After the matter was considered by the subcommittee the whole matter was brought before the whole Democratic part of the Committee on Finance and discussed, and quite varying proposals were submitted.

Section 41, as now written in the bill as a Senate committee amendment, is a proposition which I had the honor myself to propose, not entirely perhaps as it appears, but substantially in the language in which it appears in this bill. It is now moved to strike out subsection 2, and before action is taken upon it I desire to make a brief statement.

The committee—that is, the Democrats on the committee—adopted this subsection, as well as the entire section 41. It was submitted to the Democratic conference. Subsection 2 was debated in the conference, and a majority approved of it, or, at least, a majority voted against a motion to strike it out. During that discussion and at other times I have been personally criticized as not being entirely consistent in the attitude I assumed in supporting subsection 2 and the position I took when the Underwood bill was pending in favor of some increase in the tax rate imposed on lead and zinc. I wish to say a word about that, and I hope this will be the end of that, and that I will have no occasion to refer to it again.

I am not so vitally concerned about a mere charge of inconsistency as some people seem to be; but in this instance I repudiate the suggestion that I have been inconsistent. When the Underwood bill was pending before the Finance Committee and before the conference committee, whether right or wrong, I took the position that lead and zinc were not treated in the metal schedule of the bill in a way that put those metals upon a basis of equality, as a matter of fair treatment, with other metals. Of course, I am not going to discuss that now. I did discuss it then.

My view at that time—and it still is my view—was that in making a tariff bill and fixing rates of duty on items in a schedule there should be, as far as practicable, a basis of fair dealing or equality—and equality is fair dealing—as to all the items in that schedule.

If I thought, as I did think, that steel or other metals were given better treatment in the schedule than lead or zinc, I had a right to insist upon such adjustment of the rates as would eventuate in a nearer approach to what I considered substantial equality; and that is exactly what I did, and all I did. Now it has been said that what I did then and have done in this instance is inconsistent, but to save my life I can not see how it can be said that my position then and on this bill can be said to be inconsistent.

Here is what occurred so far as this bill is concerned. I have told you what occurred when the Underwood bill was under consideration; but here, Mr. President, we found a bill of an entirely different character; we found an entirely different situation. In this bill as it came to us from the House there was a tax levied upon copper and its products, but not in like manner on other similar metals. The subcommittee, made up of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and myself, all reside in States producing other metals of like kind and used for like purposes. There is no copper produced in the State of Missouri, and only in a small way, as I understand, in New Jersey, and comparatively in a small way in Colorado; but great quantities of zinc are produced in all three of these States, and great quantities of lead are produced in both Missouri and Colorado. There was not a dissenting voice in the subcommittee to the proposition that if copper was to be taxed in the bill, the other metals should go along with copper and bear the same burden. Is that inconsistency on my part? Lead and zinc were not in the bill as it came from the House. I did not try to keep them out, but, on the contrary, I insisted upon putting them in. Was my position inconsistent? Now, I leave that question at that point, for it is after all only a very immaterial side issue. I wished merely to settle this talk of inconsistency in my position, once for all.

Mr. President, a word now as to the motion itself. I voted in committee to put subsection 2 in the bill, and I voted in the conference to keep it in. I did so because I considered it a fair and just measure of tax legislation, and I think so yet. I so stated to the committee and I so stated to the conference, and urged my views to that effect. I believe the principle embodied in this subsection 2 is a correct one; but, Mr. President, I believe, from information coming to me and to the committee, that it is also true that the amount of revenue that would be derived from this subsection would be small, and that the trouble and expense of collecting it would scarcely justify the retention of the subsection in order to secure the revenue it would produce. Some revenue would be produced by it undoubtedly; but its collection would be expensive and would divert the activities of quite a large number of the agents of the Treasury Department to trace down these various items and look after the collection of the revenues to be derived therefrom, when the activities of these agents might be more profitably employed in other directions. At least, that is what I am informed by men who ought to know more about it than I do.

Now, Mr. President, the Finance Committee, since the conference was held, has discussed subsection 2 on several occasions, striving to arrive at a correct conclusion. There is a divided opinion among the members of that committee as to whether or not the subsection ought to remain in the bill; but I will say that at the last meeting of the committee, some days ago, it was determined by the committee, on a divided vote, that if the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]—who, we had been informed, would make a motion to strike out this subsection—should offer the motion, or if any other Senator should make that motion, the committee, although divided in opinion as to the efficacy of the subsection and as to whether it would result in any substantial benefit to the Treasury—but, mind you, not questioning the soundness of the proposition itself as a legislative proposition——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that the action of the committee was not unanimous.

Mr. STONE. I thought I had said that.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I said that there was a divided opinion in the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I would not have interrupted the Senator if I had known that.

Mr. STONE. I do not object to an interruption. I was about to say that if the Senate saw proper to strike it out, the general opinion of the committee was that no serious harm would result.

Mr. President, I am now acting as the spokesman of the committee. That is why I am on the floor. I think a majority of the committee in the final analysis is of the opinion that the retention of subsection 2 would not add materially to the value of the bill or result in any particular advantage to the Treasury; nor, on the other hand, would it do any harm to keep it in.

That much I wished to say as expressive of the attitude of the members of the committee, as I understand their attitude.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have no criticism to make in this connection of the Senate Committee on Finance. When the committee adopted subdivision 2 of the munitions paragraph, it gave us a provision which is immeasurably superior to the provision for a tax on copper as the revenue bill came to us from the House. The provision given us by the committee as it now stands, and as it is embodied in subsection 2, is eminently fairer and more just and reasonable than was the provision for the tax on copper as it came from the House, and I was very glad that the committee did as it did. Its action was very agreeable to me.

However, I believed then, and still believe, that there should be no tax in this bill on raw material unless all raw materials which are now and have been for some time enjoying an unusual degree of prosperity are taxed all alike. I do not believe it is just to single out a product of the metal-producing States and put a tax on metals when there are many other raw products enjoying just as great or greater prosperity which go untaxed.

A tax on metals is peculiarly a tax on development, industry, and exploration of the western country. It strikes with peculiar force the far Western States—the metal-producing States of the Union. It would have very much of a tendency to discourage prospectors from going out and discovering new bodies of ore, and getting capital for their development, and opening up new mines for the benefit of the entire country. It would have a very strong tendency to discourage the operation and development of many small mines which have scarcely reached the productive point or have no more than reached that point. It would be very strongly resented by the people of the mining States. The mining business is a hazardous business. It is extremely sensitive, and capital and labor are very easily turned away from it.

A few weeks ago, and while this problem was being handled by the Senate Committee on Finance, there was a gentleman here who is a constituent of mine, who lives in Missoula, Mont.—Dr. E. G. Ellis. He is a man of moderate means, but he and some associates have been for many years struggling in the development of a zinc mine in the Coeur d'Alene country in Idaho. They have put into it all the means which they could command from their modest incomes, from their salaries, from their earnings. They were all men of modest means, and are now. Nevertheless, being possessed of that redoubtable courage, industry, and pluck which characterize those who make the mining business a success, they have stuck to it for quite a number of years, in the face of many discouragements, meanwhile undergoing many hardships themselves, much self-denial, and struggling and working in the face of adversity and obstacles. A short time ago they succeeded in developing their mining property to a point where they could ship ore and where there is a prospect that there may be some profit in the handling of the ore and the further development of the property.

But this gentleman, who has had considerable experience at mining, and who is a very conservative and sensible business man, told me, while he was in this city a few weeks ago, while this matter was under discussion by the committee, that if any tax were put upon zinc they would in all probability have to stop shipments from their mine and could not afford to put in any more money for its development. He said they would, he expected, have to close down, and that, too, after years of work under discouraging circumstances, and after feeling that they had just arrived at the point where they could afford to ship ore and get out some money and use it in the further development of the property without going down into their pockets for the capital. He said that any tax upon the production of zinc would almost necessarily cause the closing down of that property, and that it would work the same way with many other lead and zinc properties in Montana and Idaho, which are just getting on their feet and struggling to arrive at the point where the ore taken out and shipped will pay the operating expenses and pay for further development of the properties. He was very strongly opposed to any such tax. He is a practical mining man. I know many of them. I know their views, and they would feel that such a tax was a penalty on their disposition to develop the country; a penalty on their courage, on their determination, on their pluck, and on their devotion to the line of business which they have been following.

As far as copper is concerned, copper is and has been for a great many years on the free list. It enjoys no protection; probably it is in no particular need of any. At least, it is not asking for any. We are not asking any for it. I think for 40 years or more copper has been on the free list; and yet there is a great deal of copper produced in Mexico in normal times, and some of it is shipped into this country and competes with the products of our own copper mines. We ask no protection on copper. I would be the last person in this body to ask for that; but when it is on the free list, and has to compete with the copper mines of Mexico, where labor is cheaper than here, to say that its production should be penalized by having the heavy hand of a tax laid upon it, and laid upon all copper produced in this country, I think, under the circumstances, would be unreasonable and unfair. Only recently has copper been enjoying some prosperity. Eighteen months ago copper was being produced in Montana at a loss, or was barely paying the cost of production.

Under the present tariff law the duty on lead and zinc is very much reduced, as compared with what it was a few years ago. We are not making any complaint of that. We are satisfied. But to go further and lay the heavy hand of a penalty in the way of a tax on producing those metals in this country, I think, would be unfair; especially unfair to that group of States which constitute the metal-producing States of the Union, and which contribute in that line of production very largely to the common welfare and prosperity of all the States in the country.

Therefore, while I felt much better satisfied with the fairness of the provision given us by the committee than I did with what I considered the very unfair and outrageous tax as the bill came from the House, I have been opposed to any tax on the production of metals; and I opposed subsection 2 in the Democratic senatorial caucus with all of my power. There I made a fight against it, or, rather, I supported a motion to strike it out, and made the strongest fight of which I was capable to have it stricken out. Now, that the committee and many of the Senators seem disposed to take a different view of it, I am very glad to be in accord with them. The motion to strike out entirely this provision was defeated by a very narrow margin in the caucus; and now that some of those who in the caucus opposed striking it out seem inclined to take a different view of it and are now disposed to strike it out, I am very glad of it. I think the provision ought to be stricken out. I am against any tax on metals, and hope that the motion of the Senator from Arizona will prevail. It is eminently just and proper, and I am very heartily in favor of it. I have always favored raising the necessary money for preparedness by increasing the income tax, providing an inheritance tax, and taxing munitions of war—the finished article. Those three methods are my methods. This bill provides for all of them. That is enough. Strike out the metal tax. Strike out all tax on raw materials.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I can appreciate the gladness of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] in having this paragraph stricken from the bill. The majority—and he belongs to it—went merrily along so long as direct taxation was confined to individuals and corporations largely in New York, Pennsylvania, and half a dozen Northern States; and the tax on munitions was all right from his point of view as long as it was confined to the higher manufactories chiefly located in Connecticut or in Pennsylvania. But the very moment direct taxes were imposed upon the component parts of munitions, which affected copper and zinc in his own State, and zinc and lead in Missouri, and cotton in the Southern States, we find that their heroic stand for raising revenue fades away, and the spasm of virtue which they had in their caucus, when they inserted this paragraph, disappears here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PENROSE. In a minute. This shows, Mr. President, how sordid, how selfish, and how sectional are the motives which animate the framers of this measure.

Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from North Carolina, whom I see in the Chamber, that it will be no longer necessary for him to press for the adoption of his amendment to this paragraph. Without any attempt to disguise the sectionalism which prompted him, he offered an amendment providing that section 41, subsection 2, on page 79, should be amended by striking out, in line 13, the letter "a" in parentheses. The effect of that amendment, Mr. President, was to exempt from the tax cotton entering into the manufacture of explosives, there being nearly 70 per cent cotton in each 100 pounds of some of these explosives, as I understand, and to prevent cotton from bearing its fair share in the production of revenue for the expenses of the Government.

The Senator is to be congratulated that the representatives of the special interests have all banded together and that he will not have to stand here alone to battle for cotton, because lead and zinc and a number of other sectional products, through their Senators in this Chamber, are united for a common defense.

The Senator from North Carolina is to be still further congratulated that he will not have to press a further amendment aimed, doubtless, to make doubly sure the amendment to which I refer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator does not state to which Senator from North Carolina he is referring, but he is not referring to me. I did not offer that amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I refer to the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

This second amendment, to make assurance doubly sure, provided—

That none of the provisions contained in this section shall apply, directly or indirectly, to agricultural products.

Mr. President, I doubt whether in the history of tax legislation there has ever been an amendment offered with a more open intent—I would like and had intended to use a harsher expression, but I will not—to frame tax legislation upon absolutely sectional lines.

I have here, Mr. President, a table which shows the money collected during the fiscal years 1914, 1915, and 1916 from individuals under the Democratic law of October 3, 1913, and under the emergency or so-called war taxes, showing that New York has paid over $95,000,000—I will leave out the odd figures—Pennsylvania, $26,000,000; Illinois, $24,000,000; Massachusetts, $14,000,000; Ohio, $12,000,000; and so on down the descending scale, until we get to the State of the Senator from Montana, which paid $747,000 into the Federal Treasury, or the State of the junior Senator from North Carolina, which paid $907,000 in three years, individual income and emergency tax. I ask to have this statement inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. And I want here, in the presence of the Senate and before the country, to brand this part of the bill as a brazen attempt to legislate purely on sectional lines.

The table above referred to is as follows:

Total income tax from individuals under the Democratic law of Oct. 3, 1913, and total emergency or "war taxes" under the Democratic law of Oct. 22, 1914, collected during the fiscal years ended June 30, 1914, 1915, and 1916, by States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has been engaged in that kind of business for so long that he ought to be an authority on the subject. I wish to ask him if Pennsylvania does not produce large quantities of iron ore, and if this will not relieve the State of Pennsylvania of some tax?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have learned more in the last two months from an observation of Democratic methods of what can be done in a legislative way than in all my preceding career.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it comes with poor grace from the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to say that I made a sectional fight when I proposed to amend this tax bill to exempt the tax on cotton. It comes with poor grace from the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has been on these tariff committees and has had the products of his State and section protected for years and years until the people rose up and turned him and his party out of power. Talk about sectionalism! His party has been a sectional party.

What did your party do in 1867, 1868, and 1869? Your party selected the South, then suffering and in trouble as no other people have suffered in this country, and taxed our people $3 a bale on each bale of cotton raised. The War between the States had come and gone, and the South was devastated, was in sackcloth and ashes, we were in ruin; and you selected the cotton crop, the only agricultural product in this country, and laid your heavy hand upon it. You did not tax the wheat and corn of the western and eastern farmers, but selected the South out of which to raise your revenue. Your party did this, and I hope you are sorry for it. It was an unconstitutional tax, as the Senator knows.

What is the principle upon which this munitions tax is levied, Mr. President? The Senator does not seem to be able to discriminate between a tax on agricultural products and a tax on munitions.

I am informed, and reliably informed, that every war-tax bill in Austria, in France, in Russia, in Germany, and in England excepts agricultural products; and this amendment that I introduced is in line with every tax bill introduced to collect taxes out of these inordinate profits that are made out of war. Manufacturers of powder and explosives and things of like kind have made the most inordinate profits, and the Senator knows that these men who make these explosives do not object to their being taxed.

Mr. PENROSE. Does not the Senator know that over 80 per cent of these explosives is composed of cotton?

Mr. OVERMAN. No, sir; I do not know what percentage it is. I know they have only used about 1,500,000 bales of raw cotton and about 900,000 linters.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, what is the objection to having cotton bear its proportion of the tax?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not have wheat bear its proportion of the tax?

Mr. PENROSE. I think it ought.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not have every other agricultural product bear its proportion? Will the Senator vote for a tax on wheat in this bill?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I will vote to tax everything on an equality and uniformly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not the principle upon which the Senator's party acted in 1868-69, when you selected a people that were suffering and were in distress and taxed them $3 a bale—the most outrageous tax that was ever levied on any people in the world—and now you come and charge the Democratic Party with being a sectional party. Your party has always been a sectional party. The Senator reads the amount of income tax paid by North Carolina, trying to ridicule the tax that North Carolina pays; why did you not read the internal-revenue tax which North Carolina paid last year—some $20,000,000?

Mr. PENROSE. I was only referring to the tax paid by individuals in the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, our people probably are not as rich as they are in Pennsylvania. The Republican Party with the exception of a few years has been in power and has been making protective-tariff bills robbing our people and making his people rich. That is what your party has been doing. Sectionalism! Why, your party has been sectional whenever you administered this Government.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator will doubtless recall that when the Republican Party was in power every product in North Carolina that came here and wanted a protective duty got it, notably lumber. It was put on the dutiable list and kept there largely in deference to the wishes of the Southern States. The Republican Party knows no section, no creed, no race when it frames a tariff bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Everybody knows that the Republican Party has been a sectional party, and Pennsylvania and the New England States have gotten rich by reason of these protective-tariff bills, while robbing the balance of the country. That is the reason why you have grown so rich, built up immense fortunes, and the balance of the country has grown poor; and then you come here as a Senator upon this floor and parade our poverty because we do not pay as much income tax as you do.

The principle upon which this munitions tax is levied is that growing out of the war and the munitions makers have made inordinate profits out of munitions forwarded to the warring nations. The South instead of making enormous profits out of cotton has suffered by reason of the low price of cotton, and the high price of cotton now is not on account of the war. The truth of it is, for the first two years of the war no section suffered as the South did on account of the low price of cotton, and I protest against taxing any agricultural product and my amendment so provides, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the bill is submitted to a final vote, I intend to say something in reply to the general line of discussion which has characterized the debates upon the other side of this Chamber. At present, I content myself with one or two references to the subsection to which the motion of the Senator from Arizona is directed.

The section was framed with great care and after much consideration, and, in my judgment, it imposed a rate of taxation not upon zinc mines, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] mistakely supposes, not upon copper mines, not upon lead mines, nor yet upon cotton linters, but upon the profits derived by the owners of those materials derived from sales to those engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war.

I shall not oppose the motion of the Senator, but I must say that the people of my section are not here asking for its exclusion. Enormous profits have been made, since the outbreak of this war, upon zinc, and the zinc mine that can not run now, even at a tax five times as great as this, is a mine that ought not to succeed, because its inherent nature or the character of its management makes it impossible to yield a profit under any circumstances. Moreover, this bill lays no tax whatever upon the miner or mine owner.

I thought this was a desirable tax, because it distributed to a very considerable degree the revenues which the Government must raise between those directly manufacturing munitions and those furnishing materials therefor, and because in some instances, Mr. President, the actual net profit to the material man is greater than the profit to the manufacturer.

The Senator from Pennsylvania knows full well that this subsection which is now to be stricken from the bill is one which affects his constituency perhaps more than the constituency of any other Senator on either side of the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me to say, if very much more were stricken from the bill it would relieve some part of my constituency. I should like to strike out the whole bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt the Senator is suffering from the same defect which he so bitterly criticizes in the Senator from North Carolina. That is human nature. It was stated to the committee, by a citizen of the Senator's State, that in the manufacture of a nine-point-two (9.2) shell the furnisher of the forging makes a net profit of $9.59, the furnisher of the copper for the shell makes a net profit of $2.22, while the manufacturer of the shell makes a net profit of $9. Here is a profit to the furnisher of the steel forging very considerably in excess of the profit upon the finished product, and in this particular instance all these forgings were furnished by the United States Steel Corporation, if I remember the gentleman's statement correctly.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. In my judgment it is only fair to require men who enjoy such prodigious profit upon the articles going directly into the manufacture of munitions to bear their proportion of these taxes. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I just wanted to correct the Senator. I know he does not intend to create a false impression. I think there is a large number of other manufacturers besides the Steel Corporation who furnish these forgings.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly; I merely mentioned the particular instance. I have no doubt that there are a great many other manufacturers outside of Pennsylvania who furnish them.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know what particular concerns the Senator refers to, but this I do know, that the alleged profits of the munition makers have been wonderfully exaggerated, that many of them are bankrupt, and that many of them have been barely able to make both ends meet. When the Bureau of Internal Revenue starts to ascertain the volume of profits and collects the tax the framers of this bill will be astounded to see the little profit there has been in the business.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be so. No such munition makers, so far as I am aware, made any such exhibition of their affairs before the members of the Committee on Finance.

I wish to say in this connection, Mr. President, that as far as my experience goes, the only interests which the bill proposes to tax which have not protested are the munition makers. I do not mean to say that they have not protested against the method, but they have not protested against the tax. They said, and I think very truly, the tax upon gross receipts as provided by the House was wrong; they said the House bill which taxed one munition maker at a different rate from another munition maker was wrong; they said the bill which exempted the subcontractor from the operation of the law was wrong; but all of them said "we are making munitions, and we recognize the necessities of the Government and are willing to pay our proportion." All honor to them.

I reiterate that this is the only shining exception to the general line of protests which have been made against every other tax designed to be imposed by this bill.

Mr. President, I have here two copies of the House bill which certain munition makers sent to the committee and whose names I do not think it is necessary to mention, and who themselves suggested amendments to the munitions schedule. Among these suggested amendments is one which puts the rate of tax which the Senate bill carries, 10 per cent upon net profits. I may say that these bills as corrected were given to the committee by two of the greatest institutions of the country. When the Du Pont powder people came before the committee they expressed a perfect willingness to pay a reasonable tax upon net profits. When 10 per cent was suggested their representative instantly replied that it was perfectly satisfactory and they would be glad to pay it. I emphasize this, Mr. President, because I think these people are entitled to the highest credit for the position they have taken with regard to this tax.

Now, coming back to subsection 2, the people of my State produce zinc and lead in very considerable quantities. The tax, instead of falling upon the producers, fall upon the refiners, and if not upon the refiners then upon those who furnish the manufacturer of the finished product with the raw material which this section covers. Nevertheless I want to go on record in behalf of my constituency and assert that, in so far as they are to be taxed by the provisions of subsection 2, they make no complaint whatever.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. In this connection I wish to state what I did not state when I was on the floor, that I have not had a single protest from a producer or user of zinc or lead from Missouri against this tax—not one. As my friend from Colorado knows, the State I in part represent is one of the very largest producers of both those metals.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me say that the copper refiners express themselves as satisfied with the provisions of subsection 2.

I freely concede that the tax upon munitions is not as broad as it should be, because I regard a great many things which ordinarily would not be considered within the definition of munitions of war become so when they are purchased by belligerents and needed in carrying on a war of offense or defense. We know that as a result of the tremendous demands of the belligerents upon neutral countries for material many other than munition makers have profited inordinately since the month of August, 1914, and inasmuch as they constituted the great army of advocates for preparedness and have done more to propagate that sentiment and to crystallize it in recent legislation which places the burden of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars upon the already overburdened shoulders of the American taxpayers, I would be glad to see a revenue law that when placed in operation would put the entire burden of this new expenditure upon their shoulders. Of course, that is impossible. We have done the best we could in that direction. While protesting against striking out subsection 2 I shall not delay a vote upon it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think there has been a misapprehension about this matter, so far as the cotton tax is concerned. There seemed to be an opinion, which was erroneous, that the price of linters has gone up inordinately, like the price of other munitions of war, and that the consumption of fiber for the production of explosives was restricted to linters.

In order that Senators here may understand that those of us who have protested against this tax have a just reason for the protest I want to call attention to the distinction between liners and cotton lint. After the ordinary gin has taken the lint from the seed it is then put into a machine to strip the little fiber that adheres to the seed, and there is a little felt product, and this is known as linters.

Those who framed the bill framed this paragraph upon the presumption, seemingly, that there was an amount sufficient to meet the needs of munition manufacturers, and that it, like other raw materials, had soared. The truth of the matter is that there were consumed something like 1,500,000 bales of cotton and linters. Whereas, according to tables furnished me by the department, there were only produced in 1914–15, which is the cotton year—which runs from August 1 to August 1—832,000 bales of linters, 412,000 of which were used in domestic consumption, 222,000 of which were exported abroad, and brought the fabulous sum of 1½ cents a pound on an average for the entire 12 months. I do not know what the lowest was; I did not get that, but the average was 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. THOMAS. For what year?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. For the year from August 1, 1914, to August 1, 1915. In 1915–16 they discovered a new process of getting this fiber. After they had delinted the seed in the regular ordinary ginning process they run it through another process, trimming it still more, and then, after the meat of the seed was extracted from the hulls, they took the hulls and crushed them, like you grind corn or wheat, and sifted the little particles of the hulls out and the remnants of it, the fine, minute fiber, was used in the manufacture of munitions of war.

As I understand, the War Department declares this fiber is the best of any. Even where you use lint cotton you have to run it through a cutting process to cut it up into fine particles.

But in addition to this new process of obtaining what they call hull fiber there was produced in this country from August 1, 1915, to August 1, 1916, 944,000 bales of linters; 881,000 bales were used in the domestic consumption; 294,000 were exported.

I should have said, in naming the other figures for 1914 and 1915, that this domestic consumption includes from two to three hundred thousand bales in mattress factories and elsewhere where they use fiber for different purposes.

The average price for 1915–16 for the linters consumed in munitions and otherwise was 5.8 cents.

The impression has gone abroad that linters have soared to an enormous price. Under the principle the committee has adopted of taking incomes that were in excess of what they deemed was necessary for the ordinary conveniences of life, the inheritance which was the wealth of a deceased one passing over to those who had not earned it, and explosives, the excessive profits made by virtue of the great demand for these articles to support the European war, they included linters as one of the things which was alleged to have risen to enormous figures.

I have quoted the price that we got for the linters. Take into consideration that it was only about one-quarter of all the cotton fiber used, and that the largest oil mill that consumed the greatest number of tons of seeds scarcely produced enough linters to pay for the process of delinting.

I venture the assertion that the oil mills hardly compute the value of linters in their profits and losses. But one million and a half bales, weighing 500 pounds each, were used last year that can be accounted for in munitions. That means that 1,000,000 bales of cotton were used in munitions.

Now, what are the facts in reference to the price of cotton. I am going to take the official figures furnished by the department. In 1909 we made 10,072,731 bales of cotton. The average price was 14.3 cents per pound.

In 1910 we made 11,568,334 bales, and the average price was 14 cents per pound.

In 1911 we made what was, up to that time, the largest cotton crop in the history of America—15,553,073 bales. The average price was 9.6 cents.

In 1912 we made 13,488,539 bales, and the average price was 11.5 cents.

In 1913 we made 13,982,811 bales, and the average price was 12.5 cents.

In 1914, the year that the war occurred, which was almost contemporaneous with the opening of the cotton market, which was August 1, we made 16,000,000 bales, and the average price was 7.3 cents per pounds from August 1 to August 1.

In 1915, last year, we made 11,068,173 bales—5,000,000 bales less than in 1914—and the average price was 7.9 cents per pound. That is the average for the 1915 cotton crop of 11,068,173 bales.

I know the expression has gone around—I had occasion to refer to it once before while I had charge of the Agricultural appropriation bill——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will incorporate the table which he read in his speech to be published in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I shall be very glad to do so. It has been intimated here that the South was in the saddle, and that therefore she was getting the lion's share of all appropriations, but was protesting whenever it came to a question of tax. That is the reason why I have gone so fully into these figures to show that our protest was based upon a proper and just premise.

Mr. President, I do not want to delay a vote on this matter. I think every Senator here sees the injustice of placing a tax upon a commodity which means so much to the whole United States and which now is scarcely more than bringing enough to pay for the cost of production, even at the present figure, which is around 15 cents a pound.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have the tables I have read placed in the RECORD and also to have placed in the RECORD a table showing the amount of tax collected in 1863, 1864, and 1865 and up to 1868 and also the action of the Federal courts which recognized that there was an element of doubt as to the righteousness of this tax, though the circumstances may have been justified at the time the tax was levied. Certainly it was more justifiable then than it is now. The United States were then in actual war. They were then put to it to find the means of keeping their Treasury filled. Now we are boasting that our Treasury is running over and yet we are asked to place a burden upon a commodity that is not now bringing much more than the cost of production.

I ask to have the tables incorporated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables referred to follow.

Linters.

Season of—	Production.	Consumption.	Export.	Average price.
				Cents.
1911-12	556,000	238,000		1.9

1915-16	944,000	881,000	294,000	5.8

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The above figures are in round numbers, and while they are obtained from the Census Bureau, it is not, therefore, an official statement.

Prior to the European war the consumption of linters was about 300,000 bales per year, of which probably 25,000 to 50,000 bales went into the manufacture of munitions. Owing to the high cost of linters many concerns which formerly used linters in the manufacture of mattresses, and so forth, discontinued this use, so that probably a smaller quantity of linters went into miscellaneous manufacture than before the war—say probably 200,000 bales.

The consumption of linters during the past season was 881,000 bales; thus it is seen that more than 650,000 bales likely were used for this purpose. In addition, some low-grade cotton was also used in the manufacture of guncotton, but no data are available as to the quantity. Some cotton waste was also used for this purpose, but information concerning the quantity is not available.

Undoubtedly a large quantity of hull fiber was used during the past year in the manufacture of guncotton. This fiber is obtained from the cottonseed hulls after passing through the linter machine and separated from the meats. While no information is available as to the production of hull fiber, it must have been several hundred thousand bales, the principal use, of course, being in the manufacture of guncotton and explosives. While formerly many mills did not get more than 50 pounds of linters per ton crushed, during the past season quite a number of mills obtained 150 pounds or more per ton.

Information concerning the quantity of cotton fiber, which includes lint, linters, waste, and hull fiber, used in the manufacture of explosives has not been collected, but it is generally believed to be in excess of a million bales.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 22, 1916.

SIR: Replying to reference received October 14, 1910, inclosing copy of a bill (H. R. 25927) to provide for repaying tax "illegally collected by the United States on cotton" under the Civil War tax acts, and requesting that all information concerning the matter in this department, and an opinion touching the merits of the case, be furnished the Committee on Claims, I have the honor to advise you that the records in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue disclose the fact that the Government collected tax on raw cotton, under the act of July 1, 1862, amounting to $68,072,388.99, as shown by printed statement herewith inclosed.

The tax act aforesaid was repealed February 3, 1868, and subsequently so much of the tax as was collected on bagging and ties (4 per cent gross weight being allowed for tare) was refunded on claims seasonably made, but no tax on cotton collected under the act aforesaid was ever refunded.

The constitutionality of this tax was tested in the United States Circuit Court for the Western District of Tennessee in the case of Farrington v. Saunders, collector, and decided September 23, 1867, in favor of the Government, the court holding that the act under which the tax was paid was constitutional and the tax valid. The case was appealed to the United States Supreme Court, and argued in 1869, and reargued in that court in 1870 and 1871, and the judgment of the lower court affirmed by an equal division of the justices. (See Transcript of Records, Supreme Court, vol. 1, 178.)

There is therefore, no apparent reason, founded upon judicial authority, for the allegation that the original tax act was unconstitutional or that the taxes were illegally collected.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN MACVEAGH, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which I desire to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I proposed in the Democratic conference when this bill was under consideration to strike out subsection 2, this munitions tax; and I am very glad that the question now comes before the Senate on a motion to strike it out, indorsed by a majority of the majority members of the committee. I do not think that I subject myself at all to the imputation of favoring legislation sectional in its tendency because I favor the striking out of this subsection.

I listened a moment ago to what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] stated in reference to the South desiring sectional legislation. The main point under subsection 2 where the South would pay any tax would be on a few hundred thousand bales of cotton, probably. The tax would not be an enormous amount; but, in my judgment, it would be a very unjust tax, because it would be the only agricultural product that is taxed. It would be unjust, because this bill and this subsection of the bill seek to levy a tax on men who have been benefited and who have made large profits out of the European war, while this industry has suffered losses since the war.

It is not, however, for that reason alone that I favor striking out subsection 2. If you consider the sectional benefits that come from striking out that subsection, the great lumber industry sells portions of its product to the munition plants. I have no doubt that the lumber industry of the North sells to the munition plants far in excess of the products manufactured from the cotton of the South.

I listened to what the Senator from Pennsylvania said in reference to this question, and I know, and the Senator from Pennsylvania knows, that the largest amount of raw material that the munition plants of this country purchase is shrapnel steel. I have no doubt that the amount of shrapnel steel that has been sold to the munition plants of this country from the State of Pennsylvania in one month exceeds the entire amount of cotton that has been sold for explosive purposes in a whole year. It is not, however, only shrapnel steel, but it is manufactured copper, manufactured rubber, and other manufactured goods of all kinds from the North which fall under this tax, and one single commodity falls under the tax in the South; and yet the Senator from Pennsylvania and other Senators have been so anxious to try to show that southern Representatives and southern Senators are sectional in their legislation, that they have attacked them for proposing and supporting an amendment which, nine times at least out of ten, is beneficial to the great industries of the North.

That, however, is not the reason why we should not support it. If we get no benefit from it in the South, if it is just, if the reason for striking it out is sound, it ought to be supported, regardless of the section of the country that may be benefited or injured by it.

So far as I am concerned, I am not overly enamored of this method of taxation. It is a temporary tax; it will expire when the war in Europe is over. The needs of the Government for money, however, will not have expired at that time. We shall need the money just the same, because I think it is idle to predict that immediately at the end of the European war the revenues are coming back to the customhouses. I saw it stated in a letter of the National City Bank in July that $3,000,000,000 worth of industries had been destroyed in the fighting zone of Europe. Those industries must be built up. They must be renewed before importation can come back into this country in the same volume which existed before the European war.

The machinery of most of the mills of Europe is old and worn out, having been run to the last point of endurance for economic and military reasons. To say that there will be an immediate return of revenues at the customhouses as soon as this war is over is, in my judgment, an idle dream. So we shall need this money and need it after the European war is over just as we need it now. I would therefore prefer a permanent tax. But there is a sentiment in this country that certain men who have sold instruments of death to the fighting nations and who have made their fortunes out of it should pay a portion of the tax to support the military arm of the National Government.

There does not seem to be much opposition to this tax from the men who will pay it, so far as subsection 1 is concerned. Therefore I am not complaining about the proposition, although I should like to see our fiscal agents adopt a system of saying that the income tax and the inheritance tax justly distribute the burdens of taxation upon the wealth of the country, that they fairly distribute them; and if they do not do it now, to so adjust them that they will be fairly distributed, and then make the tax high enough to get the money which the Government needs and let the people of the United States know how much taxes they are paying and what they are paying them for, so as to enable us to bring about economy in running the Government. But the policy for the time being has been determined upon to tax the manufacturers of munitions.

It has not been the policy of either the House of Representatives or of the Senate, as expressed by their committees, to levy this tax on all classes of munitions of war. A soldier's uniform is as much a munition of war as is the gun he carries on his back; the horse he rides and the bridle with which he controls the horse are as much munitions of war as are the guns that are carried along in the marching of an army; but the committee has not determined to tax the horse or the gun or the uniform. No; they have limited their tax to the proposition that we shall tax the man who is making an instrument of death—the instrument that carries death to other people. That is the policy, and that was the policy of the House bill. That is the policy of the Senate bill. It is the producers of that class of munitions that have made the greatest profits in this country. If that is the fact, if that is the intention—and evidently it is—of Congress and of the committees in subsection 1, then why should subsection 2 be related to it at all? A man who is producing lumber in the North does not know whether his lumber goes into a house or whether it goes into a caisson; the man who is producing raw cotton in the South does not know whether his raw cotton is going into a suit of clothes or whether it is going into explosives for a great shell; and so on through the list. On the other hand, the lumber industry has been one of the industries of this country which has not prospered so greatly as have the other industries of the country. The cotton industry has been the one industry that has suffered by the European war. If time permitted I could go further into the question of raw materials and point out many from which there has been no great profit made.

More than that: In most of these raw materials the price has not been fixed by the price of munitions of war, but the price has been fixed by the general demand in the home market, which to some degree may have been influenced by the fact that the man manufacturing munitions was in the field buying raw material; but only to that extent has the price been affected. Therefore I felt that it was very unjust to have the producers of these raw materials coupled up with the men who were making instruments of death and making great profits out of them.

But there is another reason why I desire to have this amendment stricken out: It is not going to raise much money, but it would be an instrument of annoyance to a great many people.

This tax was to begin on the 1st day of last January. You were going to tax a man for the profit he made before you announced that your tax started. You traveled back into every little corporation in the iron and steel industry, in the lumber industry, in the cotton industry, and in numerous other industries to find out how much went to the munition manufacturers and how much went to the public. Those people would have to have their books inspected, and they would be put to endless annoyance if this subsection 2 should remain in the bill.

To what avail? You might get some revenue out of it this year, but next year, in my judgment, you would practically get none, because under the terms of this munitions section it is only corporations that are taxed; individuals are not taxed.

Now, as to subsection 1, I suppose you would practically reach every producer of munitions. So far as I know, there is no producer of munitions who is not in corporate form, and a tax on munitions would have reached and will reach all manufacturers of munitions; but when you come to the raw material, there may be some producers who are organized as corporations and some who are acting as individuals. For the future, however, if subsection 2 remains in the bill, in my judgment every dollar of raw material which was sold to munition factories would be sold by an individual and not by a corporation, because if you leave the door open, if you do not make it unlawful, men are not going to pay taxes when they do not want to do so. Do you suppose the corporations that had lumber to sell to a munition plant would sell it direct and have to pay 5 per cent tax on its net profits, when they could sell it to an individual, who could make a legitimate sale to the munition plant and save 5 per cent, or the larger portion of it?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, presumably these profits are very large. Does the Senator think that shifting would occur in view of the large surtax which the individual must pay and from which the corporation is exempt?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any distinction in the matter.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I will call his attention to some figures which I had Mr. McCoy make upon the subject. Take an income of $250,000. The corporation tax is 2 per cent and the munition tax, we will say, is 10 per cent. The total tax would be $30,500 in that case, if the corporation were the material man. If it were an individual, the surtax with the normal tax would be $15,920, and the added 10 per cent or 5 per cent, as the case may be—the difference would be the same in each instance—would increase the tax to $40,420, making a difference in favor of the corporation as against the individual of $9,920.

In the case of an income of $500,000 the corporation tax would be $60,000 and the individual tax would be $67,920. In each instance the individual would pay a larger tax if subjected to this special war tax than would the corporation if the tax were collected under the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think that my friend from Colorado catches my reasoning, nor do I believe that he comprehends the real proposition in reference to this income legislation in this respect.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator to say that under the terms of the bill as it is framed it would be easy to evade this tax, even if it were levied, because the material man would be transformed from a corporation into an individual. That means the 5 per cent tax would be avoided. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would not affect him in either case, I am sure. I think the Senator misunderstands the proposition, and I will try to see if I can not present my case to him in another way, so that he will see what I mean.

Suppose the United States Steel Corporation is selling shrapnel steel and the Bethlehem Steel Co. wants to buy shrapnel steel for the purpose of making munitions. Probably they would not buy it from that source, but, to make the case, we will assume that the United States Steel Corporation is proposing to sell a hundred thousand dollars' worth of shrapnel steel and the Bethlehem Steel Co. is proposing to buy it in order to make munitions. We will assume that the profits on that transaction are $10,000. Possibly they would be subject in making that sale, if they sold the steel direct, to 5 per cent on $10,000; which would be $500. Of course the figures of that transaction could be multiplied a hundredfold. Suppose, on the other hand, they sold steel to the Senator from Colorado or to me as an individual at such a price that we could pass it on for 1 per cent, instead of 5 per cent. They would make 4 per cent, and the Senator or myself would make 1 per cent and it would not bring the corporation under the surtax at all—they would have nothing to do with it—and it would not bring us under the surtax, largely because we would be merely an intervening buyer who would absorb 1 per cent of the 5 per cent that the Government would otherwise get because of the transaction. So I say it stands to reason that the corporation would not sell directly to the munitions maker, but would sell to an individual, and let him pass it on.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it seems to me that that criticism could be easily obviated, and I have suggested to the committee that, after the word "corporation," the words "or individual" should be added.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It could have been easily obviated; but the purpose of the committee is to strike the subsection out, and I am thoroughly in accord with the committee in favor of striking it out; so that there is no necessity for amending it if it is going out. If it stays in, I agree with the Senator that the amendment he has suggested would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will state that I had intended to offer an amendment similar to the one suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; but, inasmuch as this provision is to be stricken from the bill, it would be futile to offer such an amendment. I desire to say, in addition, that I myself agree with the Senator from Alabama that the subsection ought to be stricken out, and I expect to support the motion to strike it out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, just a word further in reference to this surtax. There is no difference in relation to individuals paying the surtax and there is no difference between individuals in paying the normal tax. The only difference is that the normal tax at one point is returned by the individual, while in the other case it is collected at the source and returned by the corporation. The corporation has nothing to do with this income-tax proposition. We call it a "corporation tax," but it is not a corporation tax; it is an individual tax, whether it is paid by the corporation or paid by the individual. Suppose there are two great office buildings on Pennsylvania Avenue, one of which is owned by myself as an individual and the other is owned by the Senator from Pennsylvania through the medium of a corporation. He owns all the stock, owns the corporation, the corporation belongs to him, and he thereby owns the building. Now, coming to the income tax, if the building owned by me produces a hundred thousand dollars of net profits at the end of the year, I pay 1 per cent normal tax on the hundred thousand dollars of net profits, and I pay a surtax in addition, whatever it may be. In the case of the other building, it also yields net profits of $100,000, but the corporation owned by the Senator from Pennsylvania pays for him the normal tax of 1 per cent and passes the balance on to him, and he pays the surtax, just as I do, and if we receive equal profits, in the end we pay the same tax, regardless of the fact that his money comes to him through a corporation and mine comes to me through individual ownership. So that it is not correct to say that anybody is affected one way or another in the surtax he pays by reason of the fact that his income is derived from a corporation or is not so derived, for that has no effect on the result. We really have no corporation tax in our income-tax system. We merely have a system by which we require the tax on dividends coming through coroporations to be taken out by the corporation before it reaches the individual, but if that property is owned by an individual he has to take the tax out himself. That is the only distinction. In fact, there is no corporation tax; and to say that the tax falls on the corporation and not on the individuals who own the corporation is a misunderstanding of the proposition.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, is there not this difference—not a very great one, but something of a difference—that in the case where the office building is owned by the individual that individual is entitled to an exemption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I intended to say that there is no difference in principle. There is some difference in the application of the rule; but in the matter of principle, if I, as an individual, derived an income of $4,000 from real estate, and that was all the income I derived, I would pay no income tax on it; but if my income derived from stock in a real estate company amounted to $4,000, the corporation would pay the tax; but that is a question of exemption and not of principle in levying the tax.

Mr. President, I think it is clear that subsection 2 ought to go out of the bill, because it will not raise revenue, and it will be an annoyance to a number of people. So far as it being sectional is concerned, the tax that would be levied on shrapnel steel, practically every particle of which is made in the North, would far exceed the total tax that would be paid in the South from all sources.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I propose to vote to strike out subsection 2 of this title. I desire, however, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in taking that action I will be relieving the State of New Jersey of a considerable tax burden. If the subsection would produce the amount of revenue which it has been calculated it would produce, I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the amount of money the State of New Jersey would pay under this subsection would very greatly exceed any amount that would be derived from the tax on those who produce cotton and sell it to corporations. In comparison the revenue derived from cotton would be absolutely infinitesimal.

I am reliably informed that the State of New Jersey refines about 75 per cent of all the copper that is produced in the United States. I am also informed that under the system by which that business is carried on a refiner of copper would be treated under this bill as the owner of the copper. Although he only buys the raw material—the regulus or matte—and refines and sells it, in the eye of the Government he would be the owner of the copper and would be taxed upon all his transactions with the munitions manufacturers.

I think the part the producer of cotton would play in the payment of this proposed tax is so negligible that it need not be regarded at all. On the other hand, the part that corporations in my State and in the State of the Senator from Pennsylvania would play would cause a material addition to the taxes that are already being levied on them or are proposed by means of this legislation. I, for one, am exceedingly glad that we are to show this consideration to people whom the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] says are already overburdened.

I want, Mr. President, to concur in something said by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] which meets with my absolute approval. I think if there is one thing that is absolutely revolting to good taste, it is to have Senators from the more fortunate and more prosperous sections of this country, which, by means of favoring legislation, have been enabled to amass untold millions of wealth at the expense of the more unfortunate sections of the country, to be continually flinging the poverty of the other sections of the country in their faces and taunting and twitting them with the fact that, because of strictly sectional and strictly partisan and wicked legislation, they have been deprived of the benefits that should flow equally to the citizens of all the great Commonwealths of the Union. The small income-tax returns from those States are read here on the floor of the Senate as a reason why such States should be further taxed. I agree with what the Senator from North Carolina has said. It is enough to rob the South, but do not then, after you have plundered her and taken her goods from her, taunt her and twit her with her poverty.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that the sectional question was first raised yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina, who taxed me with sectionalism and with the advocacy of measures in behalf of my own State.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator does not mean that I taxed him with sectionalism.

Mr. OLIVER. I understood that Senator SIMMONS was the senior Senator from North Carolina. It was Senator SIMMONS, not Senator OVERMAN. In reply to that I was forced to call attention to the sectional provisions of the measure now before the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will say that my remarks had reference to what occurred here to-day. I do not think either the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] or the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is to be charged with having injected the sectional issue into this discussion, or into the greater discussion that is going on throughout this country now. That credit, if credit it is, clearly belongs to the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the sectional question was not raised by me. Our Democratic friends have been accustomed to abusing the Republican Party for 15 or 20 years. The tariff policy has been termed a robbery. "Predatory interests" and a lot of other terms have been used with great recklessness, and now our friends become remarkably sensitive when the minority in this Chamber undertakes to criticize the pending tariff bill or any other measure that may be before the body.

I simply wanted to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that the majority went merrily along doubling the corporation tax, which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has clearly analyzed and has shown ultimately falls on the individual, and from him the logical deduction is that it falls on the consumer, and went on increasing the income tax in its various schedules. When it came to the wine schedule, immediately the terrific sectional battle between California and Ohio and New Jersey occurred. To-day we listened to speeches that evidently had been prepared before it had been determined to eliminate this paragraph, and apparently had to be delivered even if their delivery defeated the elimination of the paragraph. These things show that the cotton Senators, the copper Senators, the zinc Senators, the lead Senators, were all united in a band of brotherhood which could not be broken by any force in the White House or anywhere else, and were determined to oppose this bill until this paragraph was eliminated.

The Senator from New Jersey has referred to the insignificance of the cotton tax, as he terms it. Mr. President, he represents a State in which the greater part of the gunpowder and other explosives is manufactured. I have here a statement which I believe to be accurate to the effect that 68 pounds of cotton is used in every 100 pounds of smokeless powder. I have not on hand the figures as to the amount of powder produced, but we all know it is enormous, and 68 per cent of it is cotton, manufactured in New Jersey and sent over to Europe to destroy the belligerent nations.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an article from the Chronicle, published in Rochester, N. Y., which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Rochester (N. Y.) Chronicle of Aug. 14, 1916.]

THE NORTH ALWAYS THE GOAT.

The long list of names compiled by Senator PENROSE of men who contributed to the Democratic campaign fund and were afterwards rewarded with office, commencing with Henry Morgenthau, must have been a revelation to citizens who imagined that crossroads politics did not govern when it came to filling positions of dignity and responsibility. As an interesting postscript to this list, the New York Sun shows that while six Northerners were contributors to the extent of $147,000, only seven men from the South contributed more than $100. The Sun draws this conclusion: "In the distribution of offices under Wilson, it's the South that gets most of the jobs, but it's the North, in the words of the chorus lady with the crescendo tones, that pays, and pays, and pays!"

It is an old story now that the income tax was so manipulated that the bulk of the tax was saddled on four prosperous Northern States. Nearly one-third of that tax is paid by New York State alone. The tax paid by this State for the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1915, was $17,417,537.60. On the other hand, the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, all combined, paid less than $5,000,000.

But while under southern leadership in Congress, the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Illinois are reviled as the home of the "interests" and loaded down with taxes, when it became necessary to call out troops to police the Mexican border these very same States supplied the men. Out of about 90,000 men now in camp there, very nearly one-half, or about 43,000, were supplied by the four States named. Such gallant States as North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas have not as yet furnished any troops for the "citizen army." Louisiana sent 500 men and Virginia 2,000. The South does the governing. The North furnishes the money and also furnishes the men when there is a call for the mobilization of the National Guard.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is "waving the bloody shirt" again.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I would like to say something before this vote is taken, provoked by the latest effusion of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

I have been sitting here for days listening with impatience to the variegated remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Some time ago I called attention to the fact at the end of one of his partisan philippics, one of his partisan ebullitions, delivered after a long absence, that his principal mission in the Senate now is to come here occasionally at odd intervals to do what he can to raise Cain. He then notified the Senate that he would probably be here until October, or until the Senate adjourned.

Mr. President, the Senator's special mission seems to be to criticize, to make complaint. He seems to have a pain in his ponderous abdominal section that he has to relieve by some method of expulsion, and he does that in the way he has performed to-day. I do not believe the Senator from Pennsylvania knows much about the bill before the Senate. I do not believe he cares much about it. He cares less than he knows about it, and he does not know very much about it. I seriously doubt if he has ever read it. What difference does it make to him whether he has read the bill or not? Ignorance of the provisions of the bill is of no moment to the Senator. His business is to make complaint of and to criticize whatever is before the Senate.

I can not feel a very great admiration for a senatorial mission of that kind, especially when applied to a Senator from a State like Pennsylvania. That Senator has not at any time since his reappearance here discussed any question from the standpoint of its merit. He rises only to say something contemptuous and critical. And, Mr. President, I am going to venture to say that the Senator from Pennsylvania does not stand alone among his party colleagues in this attitude. In comparison he holds only a rather exceptional position as to his attendance upon the sessions of the Senate. He comes only now and then, at rare intervals, to deliver his maledictions, and then disappears. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is generally here, also the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is generally here, are here, nevertheless, apparently also merely to make politics for the promotion of party ends in this campaign.

Right here I am going to venture this statement: We have this railroad legislation coming up, involving a critical, delicate, difficult situation of great national moment. I mean to watch these gentlemen and see if the prophecy I now make shall be fulfilled, namely, that their entire effort will be so to direct events as to make partisan politics to their advantage. I so prophesy, and shall wait to see what happens.

It is suggested to me by a Senator—on the side—that they will want to bring on a strike. Well, I will not now go that far; only I will say that I fear that they will do what they can to promote a strike if they believe a strike will promote the election of the Republican candidate for President. They will be governed by that consideration.

Mr. President, there is one dominant proposition I assert. You will not get one of these Senators on the other side, with the possible except of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who did have the audacity the other day to assail one of the great measures enacted during this administration, the Federal reserve bank act——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Never mind, now; sit down and keep the peace. [Laughter.] The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]—none of them will rise here on the floor of the Senate and denounce in specific terms any of the specific, important enactments of the Democratic Congress and Democratic President since Woodrow Wilson was inaugurated as our Chief Executive. Neither will they specifically assail anything the President has done with respect to our foreign relations. They will do what Mr. Hughes is doing; they will indulge in glittering generalities by way of indefinite criticism, but they will not specify.

Mr. President, I have never known such a motley group of discredited bosses and political nondescripts gathered about any candidate for a great office as are now gathered about Mr. Hughes. Look for a minute at some of the leaders.

Look at Roosevelt—the Warwick who made Hughes. Except for Roosevelt, Hughes was not possible; except for Roosevelt, Hughes would still be impossible. The whole country knows that Hughes could not have been nominated without Roosevelt's support, and to-day Hughes goes limping and leaning upon Roosevelt as upon a crutch. Then there is PENROSE, the Republican boss supreme.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as the Senator has referred to me, I want to assure him that I am a plain, humble toiler in the vineyard.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, you see I have books here before me, but I do not wish to open them. The books I have before me are, first, the hearings of the committee presided over by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], examining into political contributions, and, secondly, bound copies of the Outlook, the publication of which ex-President Roosevelt was the chief editor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I inquire whether any of the contributors who testified were appointed to office by Republican Presidents?

Mr. STONE. The items I have marked in these books, Mr. President, are these: In the testimony taken before Senator CLAPP'S committee I have marked the testimony of Senator PENROSE and ex-President Roosevelt, and in the Outlook the articles I have marked set forth some of the things ex-President Roosevelt had to say in expressing his opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania as one of the then plain and humble toilers in the vineyard of the Lord.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not believe all he reads in the magazines. A few years ago I read some very interesting stories about the Senator from Missouri and a baking-powder proposition in Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. But I passed them by as unworthy of more than a casual attention. It is true that indictments were talked about.

Mr. STONE. Yes; that was written, but who wrote them?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know.

Mr. STONE. No; the Senator does not. Nor do I. They were written by cheap penny-a-liners in irresponsible magazines; but who wrote these things here?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, yes—the value of the article depends greatly upon whom it is aimed at, I can see, Mr. President. It is a very substantial article when it is aimed at a Republican, but unworthy of notice when it exposes the Senator's connection with baking-powder frauds in the State of Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if we are to advert to cheap random statements made in newspapers or magazines, unsigned, from unknown and irresponsible sources, there could be no end to such a controversy, and such a controversy would be without meaning. I do not deal in trash of that kind. What I have here is what Theodore Roosevelt said about the Senator from Pennsylvania and what the Senator from Pennsylvania said about Theodore Roosevelt. That is authentic and the authorship definite. I will not read these extracts, Mr. President, unless called for. I will not put them in the RECORD. Indeed, it might be considered unparliamentary if I should, and my personal friendship for the Senator is such that I would prefer not to read them. The Senator must be familiar with what the colonel said of him, and he must know what he said about Roosevelt.

If I should read these old familiar articles we would see again what Warwick thought of the boss and what the boss thought of Warwick.

Then we have the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the supreme mathematical juggler. This Senator can marshal and arrange figures to prove anything he wants to prove. He can unhorse Newton, Galileo, or any other man, even though he may unsettle the law of gravitation or astronomical systems. Just turn him loose and he can prove whatever he thinks it necessary to prove.

Then there is Perkins. PENROSE and SMOOT, of the old guard, and Roosevelt and Perkins, of the new era. What is Perkins's mission in public life? Is that a mystery? We have heard about the "Wolf of Wall Street." I would not characterize Mr. Perkins as a "wolf," but rather as the Iago of Wall Street. His conception of public policy is well set forth in what Iago said to Roderigo in Shakespeare's great tragedy of "Othello":

> Put money in thy purse. * * * Fill thy purse with money. * * * If sanctimony and a frail vow betwixt an erring barbarian and a supersubtle Venetian be not too hard for my wits and all the tribe of hell, thou shalt enjoy her; therefore, make money. * * * Go make money.

Make money is the measure of duty and patriotism.

Here we have this sweet quartet—Perkins, Roosevelt, PENROSE, and SMOOT—fighting in the forefront, hand to hand, for the election of Mr. Hughes. It is an inspiring spectacle.

You have not a distinctive public measure to propose. I challenge you to state one. Moreover, I challenge you now to state specifically just what thing in the foreign or domestic affairs of this country occurring under the Wilson administration you particularly criticize and condemn. Numerous great constructive measures, as you know, have been passed during this administration, almost every one of which you opposed with more or less obstinacy. I invite you to pick them out, one by one. Shall I name them to you? Offhand, I will name some of them.

There is the Federal reserve bank bill, the Federal Trade Commission bill, the land bank or rural-credits bill, the ship bill, the increase Navy bill, the defense bills, and so on. Be game now and tell us which one of these you assail and condemn, and exactly wherein you condemn them. Give us a bill of particulars.

It is easy to stand up and in general terms denounce and criticize, but there is not one among you who will pick out any one of the great constructive measures that have been enacted and condemn it. Dare you? I repeat, you dare not do it. I challenge you now to take these measures, one by one, those I have named, or others, and denounce them. You will not do it. The challenge stands.

Mr. PENROSE. With the exception of the preparedness measure, every other bill mentioned by the Senator, in my opinion, is a vicious measure, and I should have been very sorry to have occupied any attitude toward it except that of condemnation and criticism.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania denounce the Federal banking bill?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I think there are a great many bad features in it.

Mr. JAMES. But the platform of your party did not dare denounce it.

Mr. STONE. No; the platform of your party did not denounce it.

Mr. PENROSE. It did not say anything about it.

Mr. JAMES. Neither has Hughes said anything about it since he has been on the stump.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Pennsylvania contents himself with saying that there are some features in the bill referred to he does not approve; in other words, he thinks the law might be improved. I suppose that is what he means. But what are the features the Senator objects to? Will the Senator rise and specify them?

Mr. FLETCHER. The platform of the Republican Party in 1912 was specifically pledged to it.

Mr. STONE. If the conference going on between the Senator from Pennsylvania and his side partner the Senator from New Hampshire is finished, I should like to have either of them rise and tell me just what it is in that measure they object to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the schoolmaster is abroad in the land again. I will listen to him without replying.

Mr. STONE. Well, I will fill the office of schoolmaster for the time being.

Mr. GALLINGER. You seem to be that most of the time.

Mr. STONE. Somebody ought to be schoolmaster, for there are men here to be taught.

Mr. PENROSE. Deputy schoolmaster, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Well, deputy schoolmaster. I will take that position if you assign it to me. Then, on behalf of the President, to whom evidently you refer as chief schoolmaster, on behalf of every Democratic Senator, the deputy schoolmaster asks you little students to stand up and tell us what your objections to the law mentioned, or any of these laws, may be. Will the head of the class, the Senator from New Hampshire, rise, take his position, and answer?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this discourse is so dignified that I would not like to interrupt it.

Mr. STONE. So the head of the class takes his seat?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Now, will the Senator from Pennsylvania rise and tell what there is in the bank bill that he particularly criticizes? I await. He does not rise. He keeps his seat.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Here is another student in the class I am instructing who thinks he is able to answer. I presume the Senator from Massachusetts rises for that purpose.

Mr. WEEKS. After the Senator from Missouri has finished his scold, I will take occasion to point out some things about the Federal reserve act which I think he does not know anything about and which it might be well to correct for the benefit of the public service.

Mr. STONE. Let the Senator tell us now.

Mr. WEEKS. I will not break in on the Senator's speech. I will point them out after he gets through.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is rather a rebellious student. He does not stand up when he is called. He says, "I will take my time." The Senator from Massachusetts voted for this bill?

Mr. WEEKS. He did.

Mr. STONE. Now, I am perfectly ready to admit that the Congress of the United States has perhaps never enacted any absolutely perfect legislation. We are all human and subject to human limitations. But, Mr. President, the bill was perfected first in the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Massachusetts is a prominent member. He came in here with the committee, approved the bill, and voted for it. I do not mean to say there is nothing in the bill that might not be improved. It would be strange, indeed, if that were not so. But taken as a whole, it had the approval of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PENROSE. Without going into a detailed discussion of the bill, I think that the American business world felt a sense of outrage when the currency bill referred to expressly eliminated the civil service from the measure, leaving it open to a horde of hungry Democratic office seekers.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is now harking back to the one supreme issue advanced by his candidate for the Presidency, the civil service. Durand, and some people like Durand, is the paramount issue. This matter was made so absurd by some Senator who discussed it the other day that I supposed it would not be adverted to again.

Mr. JAMES. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, however, as a fact the Federal Reserve Board appointed practically all the officials from the civil-service list, and the Senator from Pennsylvania can point out no hungry Democratic office seeker, in my judgment, who got a place. At least I know of none from Kentucky who did.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know where the Senator from Kentucky was if the hungry Democrats were not well fed. He was not on the job.

Mr. JAMES. I am always willing, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, to get a position for a Democrat, but I was merely pointing out that they required an examination before they would appoint anyone in the Federal Reserve System. I do not think that they ought to have done it.

Mr. PENROSE. It was not a competitive examination. The bill in that respect was a deliberate raid on the merit system in one of the last departments of the Government wherein it should have been permitted, a great financial system, and incompetent men from all over the country were appointed in connection with the work.

Mr. JAMES. I recognize that if there is any champion of civil-service efficiency and competitive examination on earth the Senator from Pennsylvania is the leader of all that crowd.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no; but I abhor hypocrisy, and when the lofty pretensions of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency and their platform are compared with their performances, any man of a logical, straightforward mental process will repudiate such a transaction.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Pennsylvania abhors hypocrisy as applied to the civil service, but does so as a matter of course, in theory only, ignoring it with the greatest complacency in practice.

Mr. PENROSE. In connection with the financial system of the country I could consistently advocate the strongest merit system, and it should have been applied.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that is one of the tricks of the Senator's oratory and performance. When he gets in a corner, he tries to start some immaterial and insignificant issue to divert attention from the main question.

I do not care, and the people of the country do not care, about the issue the Senator now seeks to raise. But they are interested, profoundly interested, in the Federal reserve bank. I assert with confidence that that bank system has been most efficiently administered; and if so, there is nothing more to be said on that subject. Under this administration it has stood as a bulwark against panic, and has been a source of constant strength to the industrial and financial activities of the country. There can be no doubt about that. No honest man will deny that. Whether somebody was appointed in the bank force outside of the civil service, I do not know. I decline to consider a question so trivial as that.

Mr. President, substantially what I desired to say has been said. The Senator from Pennsylvania and his active colleagues on that side seem to have no other mission in the Senate at this time than to try to raise the devil as far as they can by bald criticism and constant effort to excite suspicion against something or somebody. They make no specific charges. They do not attack anything specifically; they just cry out aloud in general terms. That seems to be their chief mission here. If they have anything else to do, they are careful not to disclose it. There is not one among our colleagues on the other side who sincerely devotes himself to the work of aiding us on this side, representing the majority, to perfect and pass any kind of legislation. Their tactics is criticism and obstruction.

I referred to the railroad situation. Little so far has been said about it, but I prophesy, as we progress in this work—let the country watch it, I call upon the country to watch it—I prophesy that our friends on the other side will not join with the Senators from Colorado, from Kentucky, from Virginia, and other Senators I see about me, to arrange some method of composing the situation. Just watch them, and see if their part in the solution of the great problem confronting us will not be that of mere carping and criticism.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me? The Senator's party has 17 majority in this body. Are they incapable of legislating on the subject the Senator alludes to?

Mr. STONE. No; we will perform the service we have in hand; nevertheless I have that high opinion of the Senator which induces me to believe that if he would sincerely devote his ability and learning to the subject he could render a great public service.

Mr. GALLINGER. That work has not yet been commenced, unless it was commenced this afternoon. I understand the Senator's chief was here, and probably the outline has been made.

Mr. STONE. I understand the President was here. I did not see him, but when he came, I imagine he came to advise with those he saw according to the best judgment of a patriotic Chief Executive.

Mr. GALLINGER. But not in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. STONE. In what way did he violate the Constitution?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I leave that to the Senator to work out for himself. If the President of the United States can come to the Capitol and call into conference a few Senators to formulate bills, and if that is in accordance with the constitutional provision, I read the Constitution incorrectly, that is all.

Mr. STONE. Suppose it had been some other President—a Republican President—I am not speaking in a partisan sense just now. Suppose a Republican President desiring some vital legislation like that we are now called upon to deal with—suppose he had been of the Senator's party and had sent for the Senator from New Hampshire to come over to the White House that he might confer with him, would not he have gone?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been here a long while, perhaps longer than I ought to have been; and I have never been invited into that little room during the pendency of a bill by any President, Republican or Democratic, to have him outline what the legislative department of the Government ought to do.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator from New Hampshire seriously say to me that the President of his party has never invited him to confer with him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not in the Capitol of the United States.

Mr. STONE. But at the White House?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, at the White House; possibly that may have happened. The President did that, but, after doing it, he—I will not say what he did.

Mr. STONE. This room in the Capitol is set apart for the President; it is the President's room.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. The Senate gave it to him. Did it give it to him merely that he might come over here for a half hour some day to sign bills at the end of a session?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri knows precisely what I know, that there has not been in the history of the Government such interference with legislative matters as has occurred during the present administration. The Senator knows that the President comes here for a "grandstand play" that the country may understand that he is dictating the legislation. He did it on the child-labor bill; he is doing it on this bill; and the Senator from Missouri knows it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, when the Senator from New Hampshire says I know what he says to be true, he is drawing on his partisan imagination. I know nothing of the kind; but, to save my soul, I can not differentiate between the President coming to the room here in the Capitol set apart for his use and asking Senators to come in there and confer with him and sending for Senators to come over to the White House to meet him there in the Blue Room or the Green Room or the Red Room or some other room.

Mr. GALLINGER. The President has not entirely confined himself to the room set apart for him in coming here to talk with Democratic Senators on legislation, and the Senator knows that.

Mr. STONE. Well, it is a fact that the President could not get to his room without getting out of his machine in front of the Capitol, walking up the steps or riding up on the elevator, and coming along the corridor; he had to do that to get to his room. That must be very objectionable to the Senator.

Mr. President, you see how futile, how puerile, how absolutely babyish these objections are. Now, the Senator, my friend—and he is my friend, and personally I like him as much as I do anybody here——

Mr. GALLINGER. And that is reciprocated.

Mr. STONE. But, now, the Senator knows that these objections he is stating are just as I have characterized them; he knows that in his heart. He knows he is merely trying to muddy the waters, merely to throw——

Mr. GALLINGER. A monkey wrench.

Mr. STONE. Merely to make charges.

Mr. President, such things as these are not worthy of discussion. For myself, I had rather the President would come to me here at the Capitol than ask me to come to him at the White House. I think he shows more respect for Senators and Members of the other House when he comes here to see us than when he sends for us to come over to the White House. It is a matter of choice. I prefer the President's method. I would rather the President came here and faced Congress in the House of Representatives, face to face, putting himself right in among us, as one of us, and tell us what he has to tell us than to send a cold, formal message in typewriting or in print. That, again, is a matter of taste and preference, but it is not of vital importance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, what puzzles me is that after the President did that on yesterday, he had to come over and tell the 17 Democratic majority how they should make a bill. It looks to me as though he had mighty little regard for the capacity and ability of members of his own party in this body.

Mr. STONE. Upon my honor, I do not know whom the President saw; I did not see him, and I do not care whom he saw. I suppose he came here to discuss with members of the committees of the two Houses this legislation about which he has just communicated to Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. With the Democratic members.

Mr. STONE. Possibly so. Those are the ones with whom he ought to discuss the subject, because after our experience with our friends on the other side I should say the President would not expect much sympathy, much assistance, from them. Whenever Senators on the other side will by one single act demonstrate their willingness to help, I am sure the President will be glad to talk with them. This I know, and that is all I wish to say. I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. This President, like other Presidents, since I have been a member of that committee—well, one other President, I speak of Mr. Taft—has sent for the members of that committee without regard to politics to discuss international questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was a good habit which President Taft had.

Mr. STONE. Yes; and it is a good habit that President Wilson has, and which both have practiced.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not to any great extent.

Mr. STONE. Neither of them did it to any very great extent, but each did it when he thought the public good would be promoted by it. Mr. Wilson has done as much in this way as Mr. Taft.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to get into any disagreeable controversy with the Senator from Missouri. He says he is my friend, and I certainly am his friend; but what I object to, and the only thing I object to, is that here is a measure in its incipiency, that has not yet been worked out by the committee, and yet the Senator from Missouri stands here and charges that Senators on this side of the Chamber are obstructing the legislation.

Mr. STONE. No; I did not—certainly did not mean to do that. The Senator mistakes me. I did not say you had obstructed it. There has been no chance to obstruct. What I did say, and what with deep regret I repeat, as a mere prophecy, not as a fact accomplished, but a prediction based on what has happened all along the line in the recent past, that during the consideration of this subject the President and the Democrats—the Democratic majority, on whom the chief responsibility is cast of working out this problem—will find little active sympathy upon the other side. I am merely waiting, and, if I am mistaken, I shall take occasion to rise and make the amende honorable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is traveling on rather thin ice when he enters the realm of a prophet. The Senator has a great many accomplishments, but I would rather trust to the old prophets than to the Senator from Missouri when he enters that realm.

Mr. STONE. Well, I am one of the older prophets of the Senate. I have been here a good many years, watching things as they occur, and I am making my prophecy on my experience. Now, let us wait and see.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose the Senator basis his prophecy upon some of his experience when his party was in the minority and when he obstructed every Republican measure that was before this body.

Mr. STONE. I beg to say I did nothing of the kind; but I am going to wait and see what our friends upon the other side shall do, and with this prophecy I end this talk.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was unavoidably called from the Chamber for a little while, and I desire to inquire what bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). The revenue bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not recognize it when I came in.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who has just been engaged in a discussion of various subjects, suggested that no Senator could make any criticism of any legislation which has been passed by the Democratic Congress during this administration. He did not mention much of the legislation which everyone deprecates and which most people believe either unwise or inoperative, such as the armor-plate plant, the rural-credits bill, and the shipping bill, but confined himself to the one piece of Democratic legislation for which that party may take some credit to itself for having passed.

After the panic of 1907 there was an urgent demand for and attempt made to pass fundamental legislation—I hope the Senator from Missouri will not leave the Chamber——

Mr. STONE. Oh, I am not going to leave.

Mr. WEEKS. But as it was impossible to do so without accurate information, what was termed an emergency bill was passed, known as the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, which had, among other provisions, one authorizing a monetary commission to investigate the whole question of banking and currency. The Aldrich-Vreeland bill provided for two things which were of material value in connection with our currency system. One was that a correct basis for a bank issue was commercial paper, and the other the provision that an issue of emergency currency should be provided and kept on hand.

The life of the bill was limited to six years, because it was known at the time that it was not final legislation on the subject, and that, after the question had been fully considered, it was believed that legislation of a fundamental character might be passed. What happened? The Monetary Commission studied this question for several years. When it was ready to make its report the Senate contained a Republican majority, while the House of Representatives had a Democratic majority. Under those circumstances it was impossible to pass the kind of legislation that was recommended by the Monetary Commission, and therefore no action was taken.

In 1912 both political parties had planks in their platforms advocating fundamental legislation relating to our banking and currency system; and Congress, I believe, at least so far as this side was concerned, without any desire for partisan advantage, attempted to pass a banking and currency bill, Congress at that time being in the control of the Democratic Party. A bill passed the House of Representatives, with the approval of the administration, which I undertake to say was so bad that national banks would not, under any consideration, have gone into the system if it had become a law in that shape. It was a loosely constructed, inoperative, unwise piece of legislation. It came to the Senate and was referred to the proper committee. Senators will recall the time that that committee took in the consideration of the legislation. The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr.

HITCHCOCK], and the colleague of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] were as much opposed to that legislation, which, I repeat, was approved by their administration, as any Republican Senator. We insisted that experts should come before the committee and point out the defects in the House bill as it came to us, and those defects were corrected to some extent, and, as I recall, more than 400 different amendments were made to the bill as it came to the Senate.

The Senator suggests that I voted for the bill. I did vote for it, because I knew the difficulties that surround the obtaining of fundamental legislation affecting banking and currency. I believed that there were some good things in the bill, many of them; but I contend that there is not a single line of sound legislation in the present Federal reserve law, which was not based on the report of the Monetary Commission, and in those respects in which the law varies from sound financial principles it is because it did not follow the recommendations for legislation suggested by the Monetary Commission, which was in itself a nonpartisan commission, made up of Democrats and Republicans alike, and, by the way, the report of the Monetary Commission was a unanimous report.

There are provisions in the Federal reserve law which are not sound. One of them is the provision for 12 Federal reserve banks. Certainly there ought not to be more than four such banks, and I believe there should be only one; but the Democratic Party resolved against one bank, and therefore we have to have more than one; and when in conference the proposition for 12 banks was adopted there was no way to avoid the eventuality.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency were made members of the Federal Reserve Board—a vital and fundamental mistake in the system, in my judgment, as it always is to put members of the Cabinet or heads of bureaus on boards which should be nonpartisan in character. Such men can not be nonpartisan; they are part of a political administration; and they have done more harm to the Federal reserve legislation for which the Democratic Party is taking credit, than any other one thing connected with it. If the Senator doubts that, let him ask any banker in his own State what he thinks of the activities of those two officers in connection with this operation of this law.

There are any number of smaller things, and one which is not so small, but which has not done any harm as yet, and that is the provision for the issuing of Government notes and loaning them to the banks. The Government should never issue its notes for any purpose, except in time of great emergency. The currency which should have been issued should have been bank notes, instead of notes in the form in which they are now issued.

But what I want particularly to say, Mr. President, is that the law that carried us over the trying times of August, 1914, was not the Federal reserve law now on the statute books and which did not go into operation until three months after the breaking out of the war, but the Aldrich-Vreeland law, which was then on the statute books and by means of which $385,000,000 of emergency currency was issued, which did carry the banks, as well as the country, through that trying time.

Senators have said that there was some sentimental advantage in that the Federal reserve law was on the statute books, and they take unction to themselves because the Federal banks are doing reasonably well under present conditions. That is true, and yet they are doing so little business that there are a dozen national banks in the country that are loaning nearly as much or more money to-day than all the Federal reserve banks combined. The influence which the business of the Federal reserve banks have on the other banks of the country even now is almost negligible. I am not discrediting the Federal reserve banks or their management. I believe the fundamental principle on which they are founded is sound, and I think by making amendments to the law and by gradually changing it, as we did a few days ago in several particulars, we can finally work out a sound banking system through the means of the Federal reserve act. I did not vote for it because it was entirely good or because it was more than three-quarters good, but I voted for it because I knew the difficulty of obtaining that kind of legislation under any circumstances.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Massachusetts has called attention to some amendments made to the law very recently.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Could the Senator tell us on how many occasions that law has been amended since it went on the statute books?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the law has been amended in a great many particulars, and it will be amended a great many times more before it will be anything like a perfect piece of legislation. The truth of the matter is that there is not anyone in this country—banker or other person—who knows just exactly how a law of that kind can be applied to our own particular conditions and work absolutely satisfactorily. We must necessarily change the law from time to time. That is the reason why I approved of the legislation which was considered by the Senate the other day—because the experience of the Federal Reserve Board has led them to believe that certain changes should be made, and we must depend on that experience to get, finally, a correct and sound banking system.

If the Democratic Party is going to depend on the Federal reserve law as the basis for its continuance in power, it is leaning on a broken reed. I want to say that the Republicans in the Senate had quite as much to do with putting that law into workable condition as did the Democratic majority, and if it had not been for the Republican Senators in this body, in my judgment, the bill which would have been passed would have been the unworkable act which came from the House of Representatives and which would have been a discredit to any party which adopted it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts hardly gives the Democrats the credit to which they are entitled for the passage of the banking and currency law. I do not defend the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think the bill was a very bad one as it came from the House?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am just going on to say what I do think about it. I say, I do not defend the bill as it came from the House. It had the framework, but in a number of particulars it lacked completion.

We have heard a great deal about Democratic conferences. I am not much in favor of legislation by party conferences. Perhaps the only instance in which I was thoroughly in favor of a Democratic conference was on the banking and currency bill. The committee to which it had been referred seemed to be unable to agree, and we called a Democratic conference, and around the table Democrats sat, and that bill was made in the Democratic conference. The amendments put upon it were largely, almost entirely, put upon it in a Democratic conference; and if there is one measure where a Democratic conference by meeting did good, it was with reference to the banking and currency bill.

I will add that we did not bind Members to vote for the bill as made in the conference. We simply gathered, and those Democrats not on the committee who had made some study of the subject sat with other Democrats and studied the problem to add to the bill certain provisions that it required. But the banking and currency bill was made there, and it was adopted in the Senate practically as it was made in the Democratic conference.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia will admit that I had some knowledge of that legislation when it was under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not only admit that, but I want to say that I think the Senator from Massachusetts contributed toward improving the bill by the work that he did on the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. What I should like to have the Senator tell us now is this: The statement which he has just made surprises me beyond expression. I should like to have him tell the Senate the particular things which were put in that bill by the Democratic conference which were finally adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Practically all of the amendments were put on there; but I take one especially, and tell him, because I am coming to the other part of his argument.

In the Democratic conference there was placed in the bill a provision extending the life of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act from June 30, 1914, to June 30, 1915. That act would have expired by the terms of its creation on June 30, 1914. In the Democratic conference there was placed in the bill a provision that the prohibitive tax placed upon bank-note issues placed in the Aldrich-Vreeland Act to make it useless, to make it impossible of operation, should be reduced to a point where the act would be operative.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I want to say that I heard the Senator from Georgia make that statement not long ago on the floor of the Senate, and I took occasion to write to some 20 prominent bankers throughout the country and ask them if that statement were correct. With one single exception, which was a modified one, they were unanimous in saying that the rate of interest charged on the Aldrich-Vreeland emergency currency had nothing whatever to do with taking out the currency at the time of the breaking out of the European war. They said that of course they could make more money by taking out the currency at the rate of interest which the revised Aldrich-Vreeland Act provided, but that they would have taken out the currency just the same if there had been no change in the rate of interest.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is easy after a thing has happened to make a statement about what you would have done under circumstances different from those which took place. I have no confidence in the sincerity of such a statement by a banker. It is utterly unsound from a business standpoint; and I will now proceed to tell the Senator of the amendment to which I refer, which was placed in that bill in the Democratic caucus.

The Aldrich-Vreeland Act, as you drew it, placed a tax at the rate of 5 per cent the first month on the issue of currency by a bank, although the bank only obtained benefit to the extent of 95 per cent of the issue. The tax at the rate of 5 per cent the first month was on the entire note issue, while the banks only obtained 95 per cent of increased circulation. The tax was 6 per cent the second month, 7 per cent the third month, 8 per cent the fourth month, 9 per cent the fifth month, and 10 per cent the sixth month. All this time the banker who paid this tax of from 5 to 10 per cent on his own notes, under the act as you passed it, was only allowed to use really 95 per cent of the sum on which he was paying a tax for 100 per cent.

The law required him to place 5 per cent of the amount of the note issue as a gold reserve with the Treasury and keep it there to meet his notes when they went to the Treasury for payment; so that he paid 5 per cent on $100, while he only received the use of $95, and so on to the 10 per cent which he paid on $100, when he only received $95 in increased currency.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to a question, but not to anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wanted to say to the Senator that he means that it was a rate of interest of 5 per cent rather than a tax of 5 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it is not a rate of interest. It is a tax. It is so called in the bill. It does not say "rate of interest." It says "tax."

Mr. SMOOT. Well, a tax at that rate of interest.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I now yield for a question to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wanted to use a minute to explain those rates of interest, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for a moment.

Mr. WEEKS. The reason why those rates of interest were charged was because before the passage of the Aldrich-Vreeland bill when banks had taken out clearing-house certificates, which were equivalent to this emergency currency, they had paid an average of about 6¾ per cent for them. The rate varied in different cities. These clearing-house certificates had remained outstanding less than four months, on an average. Therefore it was estimated that the cost of this currency would be less than the cost of clearing-house certificates during the panics which we have had since the Civil War.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask the Senator to whom did they pay the 6¾ per cent?

Mr. WEEKS. They paid it to whomever they borrowed the money from.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, they issued the clearing-house certificates themselves.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator does not understand a clearing-house certificate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, I do. I wish the Senator to make a statement, but I certainly understand clearing-house certificates.

Mr. WEEKS. I will make a statement. Clearing-house certificates were made in this way: A bank would go to the clearing house and ask to take out clearing-house certificates. It would deposit its security against the certificates; usually certificates were issued based on three-fourths of the par value of the securities deposited. These were guaranteed by all the banks belonging to the clearing house. Then, instead of paying the differences at clearing the next day and following days in currency, they used these clearing-house certificates to pay the differences, and the bank that held the clearing-house certificate of another bank received interest on that clearing-house certificate while it held it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that perfectly. The banks composed the clearing house.

Mr. WEEKS. They did.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The banks were the clearing house, and when they paid interest to the clearing house they paid it to themselves. I understand that perfectly. The banks composing the clearing house took out notes from the clearing house and paid into the clearing house a percentage on those notes, paid it to their own partnership.

Mr. WEEKS. Why, Mr. President, they did not pay the interest to the clearing house. They paid the interest to the bank that held the clearing-house certificate. The clearing house had nothing to do with the interest. The Senator does not understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They paid it to the bank that took out the clearing-house certificate?

Mr. WEEKS. They paid it to the bank holding the certificate.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. A bank would hold B bank's clearing-house certificate, and A bank would charge B bank interest on that certificate while it held it.

Mr. SMOOT. The same as any other loan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely; exactly what I was saying. If they charged it to the bank that they let have the certificate, then the bank that borrowed the certificate from them was paying that rate of interest. But to whom did the rate of interest go? Did it go to the clearing house, composed of banks?

Mr. WEEKS. Never in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. Never in the world.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. To whom did it go, then?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, it went to the bank that made the loan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Just the same as if it had made a loan to the Senator from Georgia. It was one bank making a loan to another bank instead of making it to an individual, and the interest went to the bank that made the loan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, the bank that made the loan got the 6¾ per cent interest for the use of the clearing-house certificate, although it paid nothing for the certificate.

Mr. SMOOT. It had to put up its security.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, certainly; it put up its security with the clearing house. It obtained the clearing-house certificate and loaned the clearing-house certificate at the rate of 6¾ per cent. Suppose that bank had been compelled to pay the Government at the rate of 5 per cent for the first month in the way of tax for issuing that clearing-house certificate. Suppose it had been compelled to pay the Government at the rate of 10 per cent for the sixth month and thereafter. How could it have loaned the certificate to another bank for 6¾ per cent? If it charged 6¾ per cent to the bank that borrowed it, then it could not have conducted the transaction and have paid the tax of from 5 to 10 per cent to the Government. If it paid it to the clearing house, it was paying it to itself, for the banks were the clearing house.

Certain banks formed a clearing-house association. They put up securities with the clearing-house association. The clearing-house association issued clearing-house certificates backed by those securities, and the banks in the clearing house obtained them. The banks in the clearing house as a rule paid nothing, as they would be simply paying it to themselves; but they loaned those clearing-house certificates to other banks and charged for them. If they charged an average of 6¾ per cent to the banks that borrowed from them when it cost them nothing to get them, how could they have put up the securities with the Government and obtained the privilege of issuing their notes instead of clearing-house certificates and have paid 10 per cent tax, when they had to put up also 5 per cent gold reserve to secure their loans?

The Senators can not dodge it nor get away from it. The excuse the Senator gives is no excuse at all. The transaction which he presents does not justify the tax that under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as the Republicans passed it had to be paid the Government for the privilege of the banks issuing their own notes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I did not think the Senator from Georgia understood the question, and the discussion in which he has just indulged demonstrates it. What difference does it make to the Senator from Georgia whether he borrows money of the Government and pays 6¾ per cent for it or whether he borrows it of me and pays 6¾ per cent? A debtor bank, when clearing-house certificates were issued, borrowed of somebody, and that somebody was another bank, and it paid a rate of interest which varied somewhat, but averaged about 6 per cent. When it took out emergency currency it paid the Government interest. What difference does it make to the borrower?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why, it makes a vast difference. The smaller banks which borrowed the clearing-house certificates from the big banks and paid them 6¾ per cent were not in a position to issue their notes for circulation under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as it was originally passed.

But few banks in the country, even if they had been willing to pay the enormous tax, could have put up the securities required by the act.

The big banks in the financial centers, before the adoption of our new banking and currency system, extended credits nearly every year to the other banks throughout the country. They could not issue their notes and pay the taxes required by the Aldrich-Vreeland Act and loan these overtaxed notes to the smaller banks. The rate of tax they were called on to pay was more than the rate of interest which they would normally charge the smaller banks.

These big banks, through their clearing houses, issued the certificates to which you referred and loaned the other banks at 6¾ per cent. If they had been taxed from 5 to 10 per cent on the clearing-house certificates the loans could not have been made.

The bill as it stood was framed so that it could not be used, and it never was used.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the reason why the act was not used was because there was no necessity to use it. There was no occasion when it was necessary for a bank to borrow money and pay 5 per cent or 4 per cent or even 3 per cent for the privilege of taking out emergency currency. It was a question of necessity, and the necessity did not arise until the European war broke out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Ah, Mr. President, it was made so tight and so hard that they could not do it. Not only is that true, but the character of securities you required excluded the great bulk of the banks from using it at all. The class of banks that borrowed from the big banks, that you described as paying the big banks 6¾ per cent on their clearing-house certificates, did not have in 1914 the class of securities that your old Aldrich-Vreeland Act required to be put up with the Treasury Department to secure the privilege of issuing their bank notes for circulation. Your limitation as to the quantity to be issued, your limitation based upon the circulating medium that they had already put out through their own notes—all these restrictions were in your bill, and killed it. It got its first life from the Democratic caucus, which cut down the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator know that the first month the tax was at the rate of 5 per cent per annum?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I said.

Mr. SMOOT. A rate of interest of 5 per cent per annum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator asks me if I know it. Yes; I have stated it a dozen times, the tax for the first month was at the rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator says that a bank that was in distress could not afford to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I decline to yield for a speech. I yield for a question. I wish to go on with my criticism of this horrible piece of legislation that the Senator from Massachusetts has referred to. If the Senator desires to ask a question, I will yield, but I do not wish to be interrupted for anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator declines to yield, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not wish to yield except for a question. No bank could pay the tax on its notes required in the original Aldrich-Vreeland Act and loan them to customers at a normal rate of interest to meet the requirements of business as they existed in 1914. The Senator says the tax was at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Yes, for one month, but it was at the rate of 6 per cent the next month, it was 7 per cent the next month, it was 8 per cent the next month, and 9 per cent the next, and 10 per cent the sixth month. Not only is that true, but the bank did not have the privilege of an issue that gave it the full $100 on which it had paid this tax. The 5 per cent gold reserve required really reduced the increase of circulation to $95 on the $100, while the tax was on the $100. It was 5 per cent on $100, with only $95 of increase. It was 10 per cent on $100 with only 95 per cent of increase; and when you admit that the big banks charged 6¾ per cent for their clearing-house certificates, you admit that your Aldrich-Vreeland Act had in it a tax that killed it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I admit nothing of the kind. Any rate of interest——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I decline to yield except for a question. If the Senator wishes to ask a question I will be glad to yield; otherwise not.

Mr. WEEKS. I will ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator know any responsible banker in the United States who will state that he would not have taken out that emergency currency under the original provisions of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act if it had been on the statute book at that time in that form?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator asked me that question before. I know plenty of them who would not have used it as they used it.

Mr. WEEKS. I can not find them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sorry the Senator can not. His reason and his business knowledge ought to give him an acquaintance with the facts. The banks had to charge 6¾ per cent interest for clearing-house certificates loaned to other banks or to customers. The original Aldrich-Vreeland Act required them to pay the Government 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 per cent on their bank notes. How could this tax be paid and the banks paying it be able to furnish currency to the smaller banks, and they in turn furnish currency to their customers at a rate of interest which would not destroy business?

The bank notes issued in August and September, 1914, under the reconstructed Aldrich-Vreeland Act, went out to the smaller banks and to the business world at reasonable rates of interest.

As the result of their issue, liquidation throughout the country was prevented.

It would have been impossible for them to have done what was done if the banks had been required to pay the tax at the rate required by the original Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

It is unthinkable that banks would as willingly have issued these notes and put them in circulation if the tax had been 7 per cent as they were when the tax was only 3 per cent.

For a banker to insist upon this is to place himself in a position where I feel like calling upon Col. Roosevelt to designate his character.

It can not be true, and it is stupid to ask us to believe that it is true.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator from Georgia does not make that statement in its literal sense.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not in any sense as a reflection on the Senator from Massachusetts, I assure him.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from Georgia is appealing to my business judgment, I have stated it as it is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I reply that I disagree with the Senator and feel sure he is mistaken. I can not accept it as true, although it is his business judgment.

It must not be forgotten that in 1914 the banks used this note-issuing privilege with great freedom, the issue going up to $450,000,000 in a few days. They accommodated their customers with it at ordinary rates of interest. They prevented a panic by meeting the demand for an increased currency. This they could not have done with the tax fixed by the old Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

Each one of us can appeal to our knowledge of human nature and know that a banker will issue notes much more freely when he pays only 3 per cent for the privilege than he would if called upon to pay from 5 per cent to 10 per cent for the privilege.

A banker who tells me that he would pay 10 per cent and issue his notes in order to loan them out at from 6 per cent to 7 per cent or 8 per cent shakes my confidence in his veracity, because it can not be true.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I know a great many instances during the panic of 1907 where the banks called in loans on which they were getting 10, 15, and 20 per cent and loaned the money to their own customers at 6 per cent, and in previous panics where they took out certificates bearing 7⅜ per cent and loaned the money at 6 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That may be true, but that has no bearing whatever on what I have just stated. It is impossible that an intelligently managed bank would issue its notes just as quickly paying on them a tax at 10 per cent as it would at 6 per cent or issue them as quickly paying on them a tax at 7 per cent as it would at 4 per cent or 3½ per cent. It is impossible that such a statement can be true. If they think so they have produced wheels in their own heads to reach the belief, and the fact that they never were issued is a strong reason to show that they never would be.

But we brought the amount down to the rate of 3 per cent for the third month instead of 7 per cent, and your tax upon them for the third month at the rate of 7 per cent we left at 3 per cent. It is impossible to force down the view upon the mind of anybody who knows anything about interest rates and banking business that a bank would as willingly issue its notes for circulation and pay at the rate of 7 per cent upon them as 3, or 8 per cent as 3½. We left them at 3½ against 8 under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. No bank can loan money to supply the demands of customers and pay an 8 per cent tax on it. No bank could meet the demands for broader credits required in August, 1914, and pay an 8 per cent tax on them. It certainly would have to charge as much as it paid. How would the money have ever gotten out to the people?

What confronted us in 1914? We were confronted with securities dumped from abroad upon the eastern market. We were confronted with stringency throughout the country. The time had come when most banks throughout the country made their settlements. The time had come when the great eastern banks were accustomed to collect the amounts due them from banks throughout the country. Yet the situation was such that if the banks away from the money centers took their funds and settled their indebtedness in the money centers, if the banks in the money centers made their debtors settle with them, the conditions were such that liquidation would undoubtedly have been precipitated throughout the land. It was necessary to prevent general liquidation that the banks in the money centers should broaden credits at a time they were accustomed to make collections. Could the big eastern banks have paid 7 to 8 per cent for the privilege of using their own notes, and using 95 per cent of them, and sent the currency out to the banks through the country at a rate of interest at which those banks borrowing could have done business?

What did we do? By reducing the rate of the tax to 3 per cent and by then taking off the barrier that you put around bank-note issues in the Aldrich-Vreeland Act——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; for a question.

Mr. NELSON. Did the taking off of that barrier arise from the fact that we passed the reserve law? Did not that make it necessary to make a change on account of the passage of the reserve law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator will find, if he examines the condition of the reserve law, that that change in the law was made necessary because of the reserve law.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I say "no" and "yes."

Mr. NELSON. I have not the law here; it is in my room; but if I had it, I could point out that that change in the law was necessitated because of the passage of the reserve law, and for no other reason.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator "no" and "yes." I answer the Senator that at the time the reserve banks were actually organized, when the transfer of the reserves from money centers to reserve banks was made, when the payment by banks for their stock subscriptions was to be made, it was important and wise to furnish an opportunity for the temporary enlargement of the currency to prevent any change of existing conditions from precipitating liquidation, and while that change was taking place, and to that extent, I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator know that the change I referred to and that he referred to was made in the special act that was passed in 1914, and not in the reserve law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A part of the changes were made in the reserve law. The change reducing the rate of the tax was put in the reserve law. The reserve law carried the reduction of the tax, which was exorbitant and oppressive as I have described.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me? I think we both want to get at the truth.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure I gave it, and stated nothing else.

Mr. NELSON. The Aldrich-Vreeland law provided for two methods of issuing emergency currency. One was directly through currency associations. The other permitted national banks on their own hook to secure additional circulation under that law, provided they had exhausted their circulation privilege under their charter; in other words, provided they had taken out such circulation as they could under the law. The change made in the law in that respect was to change that condition, because you adopted a new system, and the restriction that was put in the law that they must have circulation equal to the requirements of the original banking law was no longer necessary. Hence, you simply in that respect harmonized the new law with the old law.

I want to tell the Senator from Georgia another thing. There were three things in your act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not yield to the Senator now——

Mr. NELSON. I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because I have declined to yield to the other Senators. The Senator is right and he is wrong. The first important and necessary change under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act was a reduction of the tax put upon the issue of bank notes. The tax had been put so high that it was not a practical proposition for the banks to utilize the bills in conduct of business and for the purpose of broadening credits.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question.

Mr. NELSON. Let us get at the truth in this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. There is no use if the Senator is going to put it that way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to the Senator; he may go on.

Mr. NELSON. I want to tell the Senator that, as the Senator knows, the currency associations were formed under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, but the reason why we had no currency taken out was because there was no occasion for it. After the panic of 1907 had subsided—after New Year's—we had good, prosperous times in this country and there was no occasion to issue emergency currency; the occasion did not arise until the great war in Europe was pending. Those are the facts.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This exception should be made: If the rate had been sufficiently low it would have been practicable to enlarge the currency each year as the crops moved under any circumstances where an enlargement was frequently important.

Mr. NELSON. But the Senator insists that no currency was issued because of the tax. I say the reason why no currency was attempted to be issued was the fact that we had good, prosperous times until the panic of 1907, and no currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act in the intermediate time would have been issued even if the change you made in the Federal reserve law had been made, because there was no occasion for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. An intelligent currency system provides for the coming out and going in of the currency without waiting for a panic. You should not have to wait for a panic to make some enlargement of currency at times when needed. No intelligent system of currency fails to furnish some plan for the enlargement and contraction of the currency even without waiting for a horrible panic. Your law was built so that it could not be used under ordinary circumstances. It could not be used under stringent circumstances. It was destructive to the men who used it or to the banks under any circumstances.

Now, I pass the reduction of the tax, which it is simple and easy for the average man to understand, but was essential to make the Aldrich-Vreeland Act more than a cold skeleton.

The Democrats first put upon it flesh. They then gave it muscle, and then they breathed into it the breath of life; it never really lived until after the days that the Republicans intended for it to die, and it never passed a breath of help to the Nation until after June 30, 1914, when, by the terms of its creation, it was to cease existence, and it did it then because we gave it life.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I agree with the Senator in this respect. I suppose the Senator from Georgia is so enthusiastic about this law because the commercial interests of the South, New Orleans and Baltimore, were ignored and his own city got a reserve bank.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not talking about reserve banks; I am talking about the horrible pretense of a plan passed by the Republican administration as a professed relief that could do nothing until we amended it and gave it life. I had not intended to refer to it, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] brought it up. The Senator from Massachusetts claimed that it was the Aldrich-Vreeland Act of the Republican Party which carried us over the troublesome times of August and September, 1914, precipitated by the war.

Mr. NELSON. And was it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Did you not build on the skeleton of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act your own reserve act? You took the skeleton of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, and you utilized it and made use of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator names it properly. It was the old skeleton, without life, without flesh, without muscle. Yes; we took the old skeleton, which was on the statute books, and gave it life.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator know that they were afraid to put the Federal reserve act in operation just previous to that panic because they realized that under that law nothing could be done? It was a godsend to them and a sheet anchor that they found the Aldrich-Vreeland Act on the statute book. We passed the act in December, 1913, but yet during all that time they had failed to start the banks; the organization committee labored a long time to parcel out the country; and they finally parceled it out so that, ignoring the two principal commercial cities of the South, they put two reserve banks in one State of the Union, and then when the emergency came the dear Democratic members of the reserve commission were afraid to set the system in operation; they had to come back to the Republican Aldrich-Vreeland measure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I let the Senator interrupt me, because I knew nothing could be said by him that would affect in any way my argument; that it was impossible for the ablest champion of the old skeleton to defend it——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not continue to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I do not wonder that the Senator can not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield because I have given up half my time for some minutes past, and I want to finish. That is not the only reason. I say that the old skeleton could not act. But the Senator says that we did not start at once with the Federal reserve bank. Why? We understood perfectly that the immediate organization of the Federal reserve banks required a transfer of reserves held by banks throughout the country from the big banks in the East to the Federal reserve banks. We understood that it required that the banks should pay up their subscriptions to the capital stock. We knew that this would temporarily interfere with the normal condition of the banking systems of the country, and it would take 30, 60, or 90 days to put into full effect the reserve banking system and give the country the blessing it has since received from its existence.

Mr. NELSON. What are the blessings?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. What are the blessings?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will tell the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The banks have not received any dividends and they have lost the interest they used to get on their reserves. The system so far has been a burden to the member banks. Now, in what other direction have the blessings come? I should like to have the Senator from Georgia itemize them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not surprised that the splendid Senator from Minnesota can not keep his seat. It is hard to stand, but it is true. It is hard for the leaders of the Republican Party, who controlled this country for nearly 50 years, to be told, and to have it proven to them, their inefficiency in handling the banking system.

The Reserve Banking System has placed the banks of the country where at any time in case of pressure they need not fear a shortage of currency. They can take their good commercial paper to the reserve banks and obtain what currency they need. When money is close, instead of calling in their loans, through the aid of the Reserve Banking System they can broaden their loans, thereby relieving financial distress and preserving a prosperous condition in the business of the country generally.

To put the banks of the country in this position is worth far more to them than the amount they have paid for capital of the reserve banks.

The reserve banks have helped the farmer market the crop, they have helped business houses conduct their business, and they have facilitated a prosperous banking condition throughout the entire land.

Mr. NELSON Will the Senator yield? I know the Senator does not care about——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not yield further.

Mr. NELSON. I am ready to stand by the Republican guns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator does not care to yield, all right; I will have another opportunity.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly; and I will not interrupt the Senator. He can take his opportunity by himself and say anything he wishes, and I will not disturb him at all.

Mr. NELSON. I have never resorted to partisan debate in this Chamber. It remains for the Senator from Georgia to turn everything into a partisan debate. Old Senators who have served with me know that I have been as free from partisan debate as any Member of this body; but if the Senator from Georgia insists on it, before I get through, if not to-day, I will give him his fill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt of it. The Senator does not arouse anything but kindly feeling on my side by his expression. I did not begin this partisan debate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] introduced the criticism of the Federal reserve act and presented the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as the great panacea that helped us out of our troubles in the summer of 1914.

Now, I want to say to the Senator that I have been here fully five years, and this is one of the few times he ever heard me make a partisan speech.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me one statement?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. All right.

Mr. NELSON. I think we can come to a fair understanding. I am not in such a belligerent mood that I can not see the truth. There were three things, as the Senator knows, that helped to stave off the panic of 1914. The panic grew, in the first instance, as the Senator knows, largely from the dumping of our securities upon the stock exchange.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Our securities held abroad were sent here.

Mr. NELSON. Yes; the Senator is correct about that. There were three things that were done in that emergency. The first was the closing of the stock exchange for a time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. The second was the issuance, to some extent, of clearing-house certificates.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. And the third was the issuing of the emergency currency—the Aldrich-Vreeland currency. Am I not correct in that statement?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the issue was practically only of notes under the Aldrich-Vreeland law. I do not think there were any considerable amount of clearing-house certificates issued during that time.

Mr. NELSON. There was a considerable amount of clearing-house certificates issued during that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There were so few that they did not attract my attention. The currency relief was in consequence of the amendments which we made to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me one word further?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I have always thought that what did more to stop the dumping of American securities from abroad upon our stock exchange was the closing of the stock exchange.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That undoubtedly helped.

Mr. NELSON. I thought that was one of the most effective methods at the time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It undoubtedly helped.

Mr NELSON. If that had not been done, no matter what else we might have done, it would have been doubtful whether or not we could have stopped that. The Senator knows what a great volume of American securities were held abroad, and as those securities would have been dumped upon our stock exchange the gold would have kept flowing from our country to Europe in a steady stream, so that we would have been left in the same condition we were during the Cleveland administration, when all our gold went to Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule enforced upon the Chair by the older Senators, the Chair supposes that the Senator from Colorado has as much right to speak as has any other Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I apologize to the Chair. Perhaps I have been a little out of order, but the exuberance of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was such that I could not restrain myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope Senators will now let us go on with the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield to a question from the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if it would not be possible to complete the munitions section of the bill this evening?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall close what I have to say in a very few minutes. I should have closed long ago if I had not been so often interrupted.

I shall not discuss the loss of our gold during the Cleveland administration. But that loss was clearly due to the act known as the Sherman Silver Purchasing Act, by which quantities of silver were purchased and coined into depreciated dollars. I will adhere to the financial troubles in August, 1914.

On August 4, 1914, we passed an amendment to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act wiping out the restrictions which that act provided as to the securities which national banks must place with the Treasury Department to give them authority to issue for circulating purposes their national-bank notes.

By this amendment passed August 4, 1914, national banks were allowed to issue their national-bank notes for circulation as money, putting up as security with the Treasury Department their commercial paper. Before this, under the old Aldrich-Vreeland Act, the character of security required from the banks consisted of a limited number of bonds. Few banks had them. The security was of a character that prevented most banks from using the Aldrich-Vreeland Act and hampered its use to such an extent as to practically render it of no value.

By this amendment alone the amount of bank notes that could be issued by the banks was greatly enlarged, and really an entirely new system was created.

When the amendment was passed, on August 4, 1914, despondency existed in banking circles. Within 48 hours buoyancy took the place of despondency. Under the amendment which the Democratic administration placed upon the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, transforming its nature and its character, breathing, as I have said before, into it the breath of life, it became possible to issue bank notes in large quantities and to put them into circulation for the practical use of business throughout the entire country.

As I recall, over $450,000,000 of these notes were put into circulation in a very short time. They stopped the tendency to liquidation and relieved a most dangerous situation. Instead of the New York banks calling upon their local correspondents for settlements, they loaned out additional money. The banks all over the country took courage and, instead of forcing their debtors to settlements, they broadened credits.

To have accomplished this result under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, the three amendments placed upon it by the Democratic administration were essential:

First. The reduction of the rate of the tax, so that the amount paid by the banks was sufficiently small for them to issue the notes and use them in ordinary business.

Second. The character of security required from the banks was entirely changed, so that all banks were able to give the security.

Third. The volume of issue which each bank could make was greatly enlarged, so that the necessities of the situation were met.

The old Aldrich-Vreeland Act might have been used by a few banks to save themselves in a great emergency from ruin.

It was changed from this nature into a new life. In its changed condition it could be used to meet the necessities of business throughout the entire country, and in its changed condition the banks did meet the necessities of business and saved this country from what otherwise would have been a terrible panic.

The changes made produced a measure which could be used not only in a panic but to avert one.

Seriously, the old bill was of great value. It was but the skeleton—call it skeleton or what you please, laying aside all partisanship and being perfectly candid. It stood there, but did not meet the situation as it stood.

What I insist is that, to say the least, this Democratic administration is entitled to credit for the amendments put to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act that gave it proficiency. Frankly, I would not have said as much as I have about this matter but for the fact that there has been an effort to insist that the Democrats are incapable of sound financial legislation. I take issue with that view. I think we have shown during the past three years, while not always perfecting absolutely the legislation we have passed, we are entitled to the credit of having contributed substantially to the financial legislation of the country and having met the emergency that was upon the country in the summer of 1914 and since that time.

I wish to say that most of the Republicans joined us and helped us and acted in a nonpartisan way. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that I think this is the second time I have ever made anything like a partisan speech in the Senate. I do not like it; I do not believe in it. I think we ought to join together to try to do something for the welfare of the whole people and think a good deal less about the results to parties. I really feel that way.

Mr. NELSON. And avoid caucus legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not in favor of binding caucuses; but it can not be denied that a Democratic caucus gave the country the reserve banking system.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, we have spent the entire afternoon discussing ancient history, which, to my mind, was an unwarranted prodigality of precious time. I think that some of us are unable to apprehend the wise philosophy in the lines of Joaquin Miller, who stated an eternal truth when he said:

> There is so much bad in the best of us
> And so much good in the worst of us
> That it hardly behooves any of us
> To talk about the rest of us.

A slight observance of this self-evident truth would make life much less burdensome and enable the United States Senate to get along with its work with greater facility and enable us all to avoid a good deal of unnecessary friction. To my mind the most disagreeable and unprofitable thing in the world is looking for defects in other folks, and especially if one is looking for the defects for the purpose of censorious criticism rather than a desire for correction.

I am not going to take much time discussing the question before the Senate at this moment. I understand that the committee has agreed to accept the amendment which was proposed to strike out subsection 2.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that we have not yet had a vote on that proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that; but I merely wish to say that I sincerely trust that the Senate may agree to the amendment. The matter has been thoroughly discussed and the merits of the amendment completely outlined by other Senators who are better prepared to discuss the question than I. Therefore I shall content myself with simply expressing my unqualified approval of the amendment and the hope that it may be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I intend to take but just a minute.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator for a few minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator let us have a vote on the pending amendment, and then go on with his speech?

Mr. SMOOT. I am only going to occupy a moment, and then the Senator can have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] had yielded to me for just a moment I should not take up any time now; but I wish to say to the Senate that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act was an emergency measure, and that it was passed as an emergency measure, with no idea of its use other than in a great financial emergency. The rates of interest as provided for in the Aldrich-Vreeland Act were so high that as soon as the emergency ceased the currency in circulation issued under it would return to the Treasury of the United States. Does any Senator believe that if there was a bank in dire distress, which needed assistance, that that bank would not take out currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland law and pay 6 per cent interest per annum—one-half per cent interest per month—when perhaps in one month's time the bank would have ample opportunity to sell off its securities or collect from its notes due sufficient money to make its reserves perfectly secure? It was never intended that any bank should use the Aldrich-Vreeland currency in the regular ordinary course of business. The rates were such that the general use of it, with the result of pyramiding of credits, could never be made profitable in this country.

The Senator from Georgia has stated that he believed no banking institution could afford to pay 10 per cent per annum for the securing of emergency currency.

Why, Mr. President, 12 per cent per annum would be only five-sixths of 1 per cent per month upon the amount of currency issued. That is all the banks would be required to pay for a month's use of the money, and the interest would only be 1⅔ per cent for 60 days; and in 60 days there is not a bank in the United States that could not obtain from the securities it has on hand and from the notes that it holds sufficient to make its reserves all that the law requires.

There is no need of trying to dispute the truth of this statement. The Aldrich-Vreeland bill, together with the closing of the stock exchange, saved this country from a panic; and unless the stock exchange had been closed in August, 1914, even the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, authorizing a billion dollars of circulation, could not have saved this country from a financial panic; but the stock exchange was closed, thus preventing American securities owned abroad from being dumped upon the American market in quantities sufficient to disrupt business. By that wise action the banks of the country were given ample time to secure for their own business and for the business generally of the country enough currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland law to tide over the crises affecting the business interests of the United States.

Mr. President, if the rate of interest had been 6 per cent, as it was in the original Aldrich-Vreeland Act, the banks would have used the same amount of currency. I never have claimed that they would just as soon use it at 6 per cent as they would at 3 per cent, but the difference between 3 per cent and 6 per cent is only a quarter of 1 per cent for 30 days; and is there any Senator here who believes that a banking institution which was in trouble and wanted assistance and had the necessary assistance for the asking and had the power to use it would permit three-fourths of 1 per cent to stand in the way of securing such assistance?

No, Mr. President; I want to say, as a banker, that rather than that the business of the bank should suffer, or rather than to see the bank go into liquidation, I would gladly pay 10 per cent for 60 days, and every stockholder of every bank in the United States would support the officers of any bank in such action.

The Senator suggests that there was not a dollar of currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill in circulation when the rate of interest was 6 per cent per annum for the first month. There was no necessity for its circulation. Why, Mr. President, there is not a dollar of emergency currency in circulation to-day, notwithstanding the rate of interest is but 3 per cent, but I assert that during the time when it was in circulation the amount used was nearly $400,000,000. That currency did not stay out long, and it should not stay out long. If the interest rate were so low that it would pay the banks to use it, you would find in this country such a piling up or pyramiding of credits that when actual necessity arose and the time came when most of the banks of the country would need assistance, it would be impossible to accord it to them. Credits would have grown so enormously, and, to use a term that is ordinarily applied, been so pyramided that when the structure began to totter it would fall and would drag everything else after it.

Mr. President, I voted for lowering the rate of interest at the time that action was taken because of the then unnatural condition of affairs. The Senator from Georgia knew that the bankers of his State wanted assistance, but it was not the bankers so much as it was the cotton growers and the farmers of his State who were crying for help. The banks could not give it to them under the conditions that existed. Their reserves were below normal.

Mr. STONE. That was under Republican rule.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it was under Democratic rule, I will say to the Senator. It was in 1914.

Mr. STONE. I doubt it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may doubt it, but that is the truth, just the same. I wanted to assist the cotton grower of the South, and so told the Senator; and I knew that the best way to do it was to lower the rates of interest, and under the conditions existing at that time the farmers would receive the benefit.

So far as emergency currency is concerned, whenever a bank in this country is in trouble, I do not care whether the rate of interest is 3 per cent or 6 per cent or 10 per cent per annum, that bank is going to pay the required rate of interest and save its credit and save the institution itself. I do not believe that anybody will dispute that proposition. It is a sensible business proposition. The bankers of this country are business men, and they would take advantage of the emergency currency if it became necessary, no matter if the rate of interest was 10 per cent; but under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act it would not have reached 10 per cent until the fifth month; and I say now that if any bank in the United States—I care not where it is located—can not within three months build up its reserves that are required under the law and maintain them against ordinary demands from the sale or collection of notes that it holds or from the bonds that it carries or from other securities it has in its vaults that bank is in no position to receive deposits from individuals.

I never expect to see emergency currency, Mr. President, used in the United States longer than from 60 to 90 days, and I believe the great bulk of it—in fact, I was going to say 99 per cent of it—will never be in circulation more than a month and a half.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will just have patience for one more minute. I will conclude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah declines to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to ask the Senator a question about what he is saying now.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator wanted me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to ask the Senator a question, and that is whether the amendments to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, about which he has spoken, were not made at the instance of the bankers of this country in order that this money might be more available for use by them?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bankers of the country, of course, would rather get money at 3 per cent than 6 per cent, but that does not argue that the bankers would not have used emergency currency at that time if they had had to pay 6 per cent for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not an expert on the banking question, but I do remember a little history in reference to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. The morning that that bill was passed—and it was passed by the House in the morning and came to the Senate and was signed by the President all in one day—three very prominent bankers came into my office in the House and assured me that the passage of those amendments was absolutely necessary to save the financial situation; and a number of other bankers from New York told me on that morning, in fact they insisted, that to save the situation it was absolutely necessary to amend the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, which, as it was then on the statute books, was not in a condition to serve their purposes at that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not care what the bankers told the Senator. I know that if the bankers that came to the Senator were in trouble and their banking institutions had to have money, they would have paid one-half of 1 per cent per month for the money in order to secure it. There is no question about it, and I believe the Senator knows that that is true. Of course, I am perfectly willing to admit that the bankers that came to the Senator would have preferred to pay 3 per cent per annum rather than 6 per cent, or they would have preferred to secure their money for one-quarter of 1 per cent per month rather than one-half of 1 per cent per month. That is all there is in the whole question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that I am not very familiar with this banking bill, as I did not serve on the committee. I was only connected with it that one day when they wanted immediate action by the House. My recollection, however, is that that was not the only amendment of that act which they wanted to make it operative; that there were other amendments which they regarded as more vital than that. I do not remember very much discussion of the interest rate, but there were other questions in the bill, about which my recollection is not sufficiently alive at this time to call them to the Senator's attention. But I do know that they had the matter up with the White House, with the President, and they had it up with me, and from New York and here they insisted that the immediate passage of that bill on that day was necessary to save the financial situation and avert a panic.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? I should like to be able to explain the very position——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad if the Senator will take the floor in his own time, because I told the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that I would take only a few moments; and then if the Senator from North Carolina desires the Senator from Colorado to go on, well and good.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SMOOT. But I want to say, in conclusion, that if the Vreeland-Aldrich bill had not been upon the statute books in its amended form or in its original form the Federal reserve act never would have assisted this country during the trying times of August and September, 1914. I say now that it was that act which carried this country through. It was $400,000,000 of the Vreeland-Aldrich currency that had lain in the vaults of the Treasury of the United States, unused for six years, that was then put into circulation. I want also to say that if that act had been in operation in its original form, with the notes bearing one-half of 1 per cent interest per month for the first month, it would have been used in exactly the same way that it was when the notes bore 3 per cent per annum, or one-quarter of 1 per cent per month.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I desire unanimous consent of the Senate that we take a vote upon the pending amendment day after to-morrow at half past 6. [Laughter.]

SEVERAL SENATORS. I object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to reply for just a minute to the statement made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The facts are that if the Federal reserve act had not been in effect on the 4th day of August, 1914, there would have been no Vreeland-Aldrich Act. That act expired by its own terms on the 30th of June, 1914; and without the passage of the Federal reserve act there would have been no temporary act in existence at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not true that there was not a single objection to the extension of that act?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why, the very fact that you people voted against the Federal reserve act was a vote not to extend that act, because the Federal reserve act extended the Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

Mr. SMOOT. The Aldrich-Vreeland Act had been extended before it was passed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to get through, and I just want to say this: The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is correct when he says that it was not only at that time, August 4, 1914, that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act was objected to by the bankers. They would not take out any emergency currency because of the fact that this currency was limited by the terms of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act so that a bank that had been issued 40 per cent of its capital stock and surplus could not get any money whatever. The result was that in the Federal reserve act we increased the right to issue to 125 per cent, and it was that which the bankers insisted they must have in order to take out any currency whatever.

Why, Mr. President, if you will notice, the act was passed on the 4th day of August, 1914, and the first money issued by the Treasurer was on August 4, 1914. The bankers were in negotiation, and they would not take out a single dollar of it until that act was signed; and that gave vitality to the Aldrich-Vreeland Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to strike out subsection 2, page 79.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, now that the motion to strike out subsection 2 has been agreed to, I ask that, on line 20, page 79, the figure "3," in parentheses, be altered to "2."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the top of page 79, line 1, "firearms." Ought there not to be a similar amendment there?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Massachusetts is about to offer that.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I did not know that.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, line 2, after the word "arms," it is proposed to add "manufactured and used for military purposes."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I was going to add another word there, "or for sporting purposes."

Mr. THOMAS. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that this amendment accomplishes the idea that he has in mind. It is expressed somewhat differently from the amendment which was offered to section 41, on the other page, but the effect of it is to limit the tax to rifles which are manufactured and used for military purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; but that does not cover sporting purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. They are excepted from the operation of the act by that language.

Mr. WEEKS. There will be no tax on any kind of an arm that is not used for military purposes, if the amendment I have offered is agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand it.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator finds to-morrow that it does not express the idea that we all have in view, we can easily change the phraseology.

Mr. PENROSE. There was so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not catch the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not put the question until there is some order in the Chamber. [A pause.] The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 79, line 2, after the word "arms," it is proposed to insert "manufactured and used for military purposes."

Mr. THOMAS. That amendment is accepted by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, after line 23, to insert:

SEC. 42. Every corporation manufacturing or selling in the United States any of the articles mentioned in section 201 shall, on or before March 1 of each year, make a return under oath to the collector of internal revenue of the district wherein the principal office or place of business in the United States is located, stating the amount of capital invested in such business and the amount of net profits from the sale and disposition of such articles during the preceding taxable year, the names and locations of the corporations, and the amounts, character, and values of the materials obtained from each such corporation for use in manufacturing the articles mentioned in paragraph (1) of this section. Where the corporation has separate capital invested in the manufacture of such articles its return shall be made on the same form as that used for income-tax returns, and its net profit for the year shall be the gains or the profits assessed and taxed by the income-tax authorities: Provided, That in case such corporation has undivided capital invested in the manufacture of the articles specified in section 201 and of other articles, the return herein provided for shall be in such form and shall set forth such particulars as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may require, and the tax herein provided for shall be imposed only on the net profits resulting from the manufacture and sale of the articles specified in section 201, and the profits shall be determined from the books and accounts of such corporation: Provided, however, That if the amount invested in the manufacture of, and the net profits resulting from the sale or disposition of, the articles so specified can not be determined, the amount invested in the manufacture of these articles, and the net profit therefrom, shall be considered as in the same ratio to the total amount invested and the total net profits as the gross receipts from the sale and disposition of such articles bear to the total gross receipts from the sale and disposition of all articles manufactured.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in lieu of the word "two," on line 25, page 79, and the words "hundred and one," on line 1, page 80, I ask to have inserted the words "forty-one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out "two hundred and one," on line 25, page 79, and line 1, page 80, and insert "forty-one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be made.

Mr. THOMAS. The same correction should be made on lines 18 and 25, page 80.

The SECRETARY. In line 18, on the same page, it is proposed to strike out "two hundred and one" and insert "forty-one," and on lines 24 and 25 it is proposed to strike out "two hundred and one" and insert "forty-one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, those corrections will be made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the clause beginning after the word "year," on line 7, page 80, down to and including the word "section," on line 11, was designed to cover the returns made necessary by the provisions of subsection 2. That subsection having been stricken from the bill, I move that all between the word "year," on line 7, and the word "section," on line 11, inclusive, be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 80, line 7, after the word "year," it is proposed to strike out the comma and all down to and including the word "section," in line 11, in the following words:

The names and locations of the corporations, and the amounts, character, and values of the materials obtained from each such corporation for use in manufacturing the articles mentioned in paragraph (1) of this section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. At the end of section 42 the committee offers the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 81, after line 10, it is proposed to insert the following as a separate paragraph:

A reasonable allowance, according to the conditions peculiar to each concern, for amortization of the values of buildings and machinery, account being taken of the exceptional depreciation of special plants, shall be deducted from the amount of net profits as herein defined.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 10, to insert:

SEC. 43. All such returns shall be transmitted forthwith by the collector to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who shall, as soon as practicable, assess the tax found due and notify the corporation making such return of the amount of tax for which such corporation is liable, and such corporation shall pay the tax to the collector on or before 30 days from the date of such notice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 17, to insert:

SEC. 44. If the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall have reason to be dissatisfied with the return as made, or if no return is made, the commissioner is authorized to make an investigation and to determine the amount invested in such business and the amount of net profits, and may assess the proper tax accordingly. He shall notify the corporation making such return, and shall proceed to collect the tax in the same manner as provided in this title, unless the corporation so notified shall file a written request for a hearing with the commissioner within 30 days after the date of such notice; and on such hearing the burden of establishing to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the amount invested and the amount of net profits as determined by the commissioner is incorrect shall devolve upon such corporation, and the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, if approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be conclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 10, to insert:

SEC. 45. The tax may be assessed on any corporation for the time being owning or carrying on the business, or any person acting as agent for that corporation in carrying on the business, or where a business has ceased on the corporation which owned or carried on the business or acted as agent in carrying on the business immediately before the time at which the business ceased.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 17, to insert:

SEC. 46. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized, personally or by his agent, to examine the books, accounts, and records of any corporation subject to this tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 21, to insert:

SEC. 47. For the expense connected with the assessment and collection of the taxes provided by this act there is hereby appropriated $100,000, or so much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the enforcement of the provisions of this act for duty in the District of Columbia, or in any collection district of the United States or any of the Territories thereof.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there is no civil-service or merit system provision as to these new appointments. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado, having the bill in charge, how many additional employees, in his opinion, will be required to carry out the provisions of this revenue bill?

Mr. THOMAS. The revenue force at present is said to be probably sufficient for the purpose. It will require very few more, if any.

Mr. PENROSE. It does not seem to me that $100,000 will come anywhere near defraying the expenses of the additional employees required.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it will be more than ample for the purpose. Very few, if any, additional employees will be needed.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope we will not have to note the presence, in some deficiency bill coming along, of a provision and appropriation for a larger amount. I have here a clipping from the San Francisco Chronicle, in which they state that 100 additional employees are now being arranged for in connection with the wine tax in one revenue district in California. How accurate that may be I do not know, but it looks to me as if one of the features of this bill will be the usual lavish provision for additional places for "deserving Democrats" left unprotected by the merit system as the bill now stands.

I will ask the Secretary to read this short clipping from the San Francisco Chronicle.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before it is read I wish to state to the Senator that there has not been the slightest suggestion in the committee that any additional force would be necessary in connection with the wine schedule.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, if that is correct, it is just as well to call the attention of the Senator to it and have him state the contrary to be the fact. I should like to have it read.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the San Francisco Chronicle would be authority and know all about the purposes of the revenue department in Washington in regard to the wine schedule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the San Francisco Chronicle.]

TO CREATE MORE POSITIONS FOR DESERVING DEMOCRATS—COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE J. J. SCOTT ANNOUNCES THE REORGANIZATION OF HIS DISTRICT, PROVIDING 100 NEW JOBS FOR THE FAITHFUL.

As a result of the strong pressure of business on the local internal-revenue office, caused by the income, war, and wine tax measures, Collector of Internal Revenue J. J. Scott yesterday announced that an entire reorganization of his district will take place.

The plans for the reorganization were placed before Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo on Scott's recent visit to Washington and were approved by the Cabinet officer.

TO CREATE NEW POSITIONS.

In San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, and Fresno the office forces and staffs will be reorganized. Heads will be appointed for the various branches of the local office and a new position of chief clerk is to be created.

Preparations will be made in the reorganization for the handling of the increased business caused by the passage of the new revenue bill. More than 100 men will have to be appointed on the passage of the bill to check up the wine manufacturers, said Scott.

Collector Scott also said that the revenue on wine in San Francisco alone would be increased more than $400,000 a year by the bill.

"There is no political significance in the reorganization," said Scott. "It is purely to put the district on a more efficient basis and prepare for the rush of business which the new revenue bill will cause."

By the new arrangement, which will be completed by September 1, the State of Nevada will be given liberal political patronage by the creating of five internal-revenue offices and a number of good salaried positions. For the first time the banks of Nevada will be made the depositories for internal-revenue collections under the new plan.

FIVE OFFICES IN NEVADA.

The new plan, as outlined by Collector Scott, is to establish a branch office and four field offices in Nevada. The branch office will be at Reno and the field offices at Tonopah, Carson, Winnemucca, and Ely. William A. Kelley, who is at present field officer in Nevada, will be placed in charge of the Reno office and will direct internal-revenue matters for the entire State. The appointments for the new positions will be made by Scott.

At present the money received for internal-revenue collections in Nevada is deposited either in San Francisco or Sacramento. Under the new arrangements all collections made in Nevada and in California east of the Sierra will be banked at Reno.

Mr. PENROSE. This seems to be an official interview from Scott, and if it is incorrect I think his superior officers in Washington should call him to account.

Mr. THOMAS. The wine schedule as amended by the Senate differs not very materially from the present bill. There is a radical difference between it and the bill which passed the House and which was sent here. I am unable to state what change or addition would be required by the bill as passed by the House, but I am satisfied that if the bill as it is now before the Senate becomes the law the article which has just been read constitutes largely, if not entirely, a fairy tale. If, however, additional help is required for the administration of the revenue and the collection of that revenue, I am sure that appointments will be made for the purpose, and I hope that every one of them will be that of a deserving Democrat.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado what he thinks would be the necessity of five additional collectors of internal revenue in Nevada under this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think there is any basis for it whatever, except it be that the interview was had upon the assumption that the bill as it passed the House would be the law, and even then I am not prepared to say that there was any basis for it. But so far as the additional appointments in the State of Nevada are concerned, it seems to me it bears its own refutation upon its face. The thing is preposterous.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will allow me, it is not an interview. It does not purport to be an interview, although it is so characterized by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. It says it quotes Scott's language.

Mr. STONE. It says that Scott's attitude is so-and-so.

Mr. OLIVER. It says this is Mr. Scott's language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say just this word: I wonder where the Senator from Pennsylvania got that. Somebody sent it to him. He is not a subscriber to the San Francisco Chronicle.

Mr. PENROSE. It was sent to me by a highly reputable citizen who is outraged by the way the present administration is undermining the merit system.

Mr. THOMAS. It was probably sent by the Republican nominee for the Presidency.

Mr. STONE. I presume it came from such a source.

Mr. President, it says, as I recall it, that 100 additional men will be appointed in California. There is an appropriation of only $100,000 provided for.

Mr. PENROSE. You will come along in another bill. This is just a feeler.

Mr. STONE. There is not enough appropriated here to pay for 100 men in California. The thing is positively absurd, and the Senator from Pennsylvania knows it is absurd on its face.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not know. The appropriation of $100,000 will carry them along very well until next December when in some guise or other there will be a couple of million dollars to provide for payments for these additional men.

Mr. STONE. But the Senator can not point out any additional expense that will be entailed. He can not point it out and he knows it. He just gets up here in that way he has adopted and makes assertions. The Senator from Colorado has well said that the official information is that it will require practically no additional force.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator whether Scott is not an official. He comes to Washington and has an interview with the Secretary of the Treasury, goes home and he says it will require 100 additional clerks. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that in the deficiency bill, which will soon be before this body, there is an item of $340,000 for just such deficiencies as will arise under this bill. One hundred thousand dollars will carry these deserving Democrats along very nicely for a couple of months and another deficiency bill will come in with an item of a million dollars to carry them on for another three or four months.

Mr. THOMAS. I think this is a sort of political play which the Senator from Pennsylvania has been carrying on ever since he has returned to the fold. The Senator was away almost entirely during the session until the last few days. I intimated some days ago what I thought to be the cause of this remarkable transformation. We all remember that the Senator had been away so long that when he first returned it became necessary for him to ask the Secretary to read the roll call in order that he might refamiliarize himself with the names of his associates, and he actually thought some outsider had committed an infraction of the rules on some occasion and had come in on the floor in response to the name of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON.] I think the Senator in offering this newspaper clipping is simply consistent. It is a part of what has been going on here every day ever since his return. The Senator is persona non grata with the national committee of the Republican Party, during the campaign at least, but he can be of some service by coming down to Washington and resuming his seat and nosing around in the garbage barrels of the Capitol for political nourishment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the excerpt from the San Francisco Chronicle, which was read from the Secretary's desk at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I desire to say that I am in a position to be informed, and that there is no truth in the article. Mr. J. J. Scott, internal-revenue collector in the San Francisco and Nevada district, was in Washington a few weeks ago; and certainly I would have been informed if there was any such increase of places.

I had a letter from San Francisco stating that there was such a publication, but I had not read it until now; that my office was besieged by applicants for places which had no existence in fact; and that the San Francisco Chronicle, the organ of the Republican Party in California, was having some merriment at our expense; and hence, to introduce it in the Senate as evidence of the fact that there is to be a large increase or any increase in places, certainly reflects upon the Senator from Pennsylvania who introduced it without verifying it. There has been much said in the last few days about imposing upon the Senate, and I sympathize with that sentiment. I desire to say that this simply refers to a reorganization and a readjustment by which the collection district of California will lose some men in favor of the Nevada district where the business is largely increased.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in this section I find the following language:

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the enforcement of the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, that is a pretty wide discretion given to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He can appoint as many employees as he pleases and he can pay such salaries as he pleases. In the shipping bill and in the workmen's compensation bill there was no provision that appointments should be made under the Civil Service Commission. I offered amendments to those two bills—I confess I do not know what became of them in conference—providing that appointments made necessary by the enactment of those measures should be made through the Civil Service Commission, and there was no opposition on either side of the Chamber to those amendments. I now propose, Mr. President, to offer an amendment after the word "thereof," in line 7, on page 83, to add these words:

All appointments of officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees shall be made from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service law.

That is substantially the same language that was placed in the two bills to which I have called attention, and I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 83, line 7, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting:

All appointments of officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees shall be made from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. STONE. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the collectors of internal revenue are not now under the civil service, and I suggest to the Senator that he except collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment will not affect the collectors.

Mr. SIMMONS. What provision is there in the amendment that would relieve them from its application?

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment provides that only the subordinate officers named shall be appointed under civil-service regulations. It certainly does not reach the collectors.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Are the subordinate officers referred to those employed in the States under the collectors?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are the subordinate officers.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or are they the clerks employed here in Washington for that service?

Mr. OVERMAN. The amendment applies to all these employees everywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. The provision now in the bill reads:

And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the enforcement of the provisions of this act for duty in the District of Columbia, or in any collection district of the United States, or any of the Territories thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hughes	Oliver	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	James	Overman	Smoot
Beckham	Kenyon	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kern	Penrose	Stone
Chilton	Lane	Phelan	Swanson
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Pittman	Thomas
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shafroth
Fletcher	Nelson	Sheppard
Gallinger	O'Gorman	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Thursday, August 31, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 1, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 31, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, our hearts turn to Thee in this hour of strife and contention which threatens our people with a grave calamity and pray most fervently that Thy spirit may come with all power upon those who shall be called upon to meet the situation; that they may be guided by wisdom, justice, and unselfish devotion in solving the problems; that a great calamity may be averted and harmony restored; that the Nation may be more firmly knitted together in the bonds of brotherhood. Hear us in the name of the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17645, the general deficiency bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, pending that I hope the gentleman will withhold it a minute. I want to get some unanimous-consent requests in.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Go ahead and make your requests.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon the completion of the deficiency bill the bill H. R. 17350 be in order.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. KITCHIN. To promote export trade and other purposes, and known as the Webb bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the general deficiency bill is disposed of the bill H. R. 17350 be in order. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, and if the deficiency bill is completed, or upon the completion of that bill to-morrow, we take up the business on the Private Calendar where we left off.

Mr. MANN. Unobjected bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. When any privileged bill is out of the way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, of course. This is not to interfere with conference reports or privileged bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, and that when the deficiency bill is finished the Private Calendar should be taken up for bills that are not objected to.

Mr. MANN. Beginning where we left off.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Beginning where we left off. And this arrangement not to interfere with conference reports and privileged bills.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire what it means by saying "where we left off"?

The SPEAKER. The calendar shows where we left off.

Mr. HASTINGS. It so happens that I am not familiar enough with that. I thought we ran through the entire Private Calendar the other day for the unobjected bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. A great many bills have been put on since.

Mr. HASTINGS. This means, if I understand it, new bills put on since. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am a new Member of the House and am not going to object at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand. The Clerk understands the same thing that the gentleman from Oklahoma does, that we went through with this business.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN. Would that interfere with the consideration of the Webb bill, then?

Mr. MANN. Not if it is made privileged.

Mr. ALLEN. If it is made a special order.

The SPEAKER. It has not been made privileged. Under this request we begin at No. 411.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, would that preclude my asking unanimous consent to take up a bill of urgent importance?

The SPEAKER. It has nothing in the world to do with that.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish to say, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, being a new Member here, that I am not in sympathy with this method of legislation. I believe all these bills on the Private Calendar ought to be considered, and there ought to be some rule for consideration of them and some time given to them, but I will discuss that a little later on in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] if he ought not also to exclude legislation that may be presented regarding the strike situation?

Mr. KITCHIN. To-morrow?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not contemplate any strike legislation to-morrow. I would not mix that up with it, and I will say to the gentleman I have not the faintest idea that any strike legislation will be in to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNER. Upon the assurance of the gentleman that that is true, it is not necessary.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman want to add anything else to his request?

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe I have put it all now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems at this time we are facing a crisis. The great transportation facilities of this country are about to be tied up, due to the fact that the big business crooks of the country who control the railways are striving to bring about legislation that will give them the opportunity to further increase their freight rates to an abnormal price before they accede to the very moderate and reasonable requests or demands of the employees who are operating the railroads of the country, and it seems to me that instead of asking unanimous consent to consider bills that these criminal corporations are seeking in the way of revising the trust laws and the Clayton Act, if the Congressmen, the Members of both branches, were doing their full duty to the citizens of the country they would muster up courage enough and take hold of this matter and pass legislation now that would provide for the President to take control of these railroads and operate them and guarantee to the people of this country that the transportation facilities will not be tied up.

It is not my purpose, however, to object to this request at this time, but it does seem to me that that is the question which the great statesmen, and those who sincerely desire to serve the interests of the country, should be giving their whole attention to. I shall not object to the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Delaware rise?

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I am the only member of the Committee on Claims who happens to be on the floor now, and I want to know if the gentleman's motion would prevent anybody having a claim bill on the calendar from coming in here to-morrow and securing consideration of it, in view of the fact that some of the Members may not have been here on the last time the bills were considered, and in view of the fact that it is proposed to start in on the Private Calendar where we ended last time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will put it over until to-morrow.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. I ask that question because there are a great many bills pending that the Committee on Claims and some Members would like to have considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government of portraits of Hon. James Latimer and Hon. Dr. Henry Latimer.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the general deficiency bill (H. R. 17645). The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17645, the general deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the general deficiency bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Coast Guard.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York. That appropriation in relation to the collection of the income tax, and so forth, the tax on legacies, munitions, and so forth, provides that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to appoint and pay from this appropriation all necessary officers, experts, agents, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, messengers, and janitors. Will these appointments under the provisions of the bill be made through the Civil Service Commission, or will they be made at the will merely of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My understanding is that all the employees are in the classified service. The general statute provides that all employees shall be, and unless there is some provision which takes them out of that category they are in the classified service.

When the tariff act was passed there was a provision that the employees authorized to be appointed without regard to civil-service law should, after a certain period, be covered into the classified service. That period has expired, and the understanding of the committee is that those employees are all in the classified service and will be appointed from the civil-service lists.

Mr. MANN. Why is it necessary to carry this authorization? When we make an appropriation of a lump sum would they not have authority to appoint these employees without any specific authorization?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is some doubt as to whether they have the authority to appoint various employees of a designated character unless the authority is given.

Mr. MANN. We constantly make lump-sum appropriations which are used in paying employees, especially in the Agricultural Department, as the gentleman well knows. Where we make a lump-sum appropriation for a specific purpose it certainly carries the authority to employ persons to do the work. However, with the gentleman's statement, while I had some doubt about the effect of it, I am not going to contest it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The provision in the legislative bill is "for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, deputy collectors, surveyors, clerks, messengers, and janitors." This provides for experts and certain officers in addition. My recollection is that the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue was asked what the view of the department was as to the effect of this provision. I read from the hearings:

Mr. CANNON In the expenditure of this lump sum, what are you going to do? Are you going to take the employees from your present force and promote? Then you would be at liberty to use this in supplying employees wherever it is necessary?

Mr. GATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Do you call on the Civil Service Commission for these employees?

Mr. GATES. Yes; these are all civil-service employees.

That is Mr. Gates, the deputy commissioner.

So that there may be no misunderstanding as far as the House is concerned, I will say that under the law, unless there is some provision which permits the appointment of employees without regard to the civil-service act, it has always been held that they must be appointed in conformity with that act.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MANN. The civil-service act does not provide that anybody shall be appointed in accordance with the provisions of that act. It authorizes the President to cover employees into the classified service. The civil-service law only provides a method which the President can call into use.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am informed that under the law the President makes regulations fixing the status, and that regulations have long since been adopted fixing the status of employees in the Internal-Revenue Bureau as of the classified service.

Mr. MANN. That may be. I do not remember the exact language of the order covering the various employees in the Internal-Revenue Office into the classified service. It has to be an order of the President.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] then asked, in the hearing—

But you are not going to fill all of the places through the civil service, are you?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; all our employees in the department in Washington must be appointed by first getting permission of the Civil Service Commission. The places we ask for here will be filled by certification, transfer, and promotion, but all under civil-service rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not remove all doubt by simply stating that these employees shall be within the civil service?

Mr. MANN. While we may have the power to do that, yet personally——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think we have no right to do it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We do it frequently.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We do not do it frequently.

Mr. MANN. We do it occasionally, but the President, under the Constitution, is the appointing power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. After the matter has been discussed and there has been a distinct understanding as to the effect of the law, and that it is the intent of Congress that these employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil-service law, I do not believe any department would have the temerity to appoint these employees in any other way.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the largest item in this deficiency bill is an appropriation of $3,000,000 "for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua." I think we must all regret that so important a matter, both from a monetary and from an international point of view, should come up at this time, near the close of the session and under circumstances which make full consideration and debate impossible. I shall ask the indulgence of the committee for a brief time that I may suggest some reasons why, as it seems to me, the passage of this appropriation is inexpedient and unwise.

August 8, 1914, the President transmitted to the Senate for ratification a treaty between the United States and Nicaragua, which had been negotiated by Mr. Bryan, then Secretary of State, according to the terms of which the United States was to pay "for the benefit of the Republic of Nicaragua" the sum of $3,000,000 United States gold coin.

For this payment the United States was to receive the right to construct and operate "an interoceanic canal by a Nicaraguan route, the lease for 99 years of the Great and Little Corn Islands, in the Caribbean Sea, and the right to establish a naval base on the Gulf of Fonseca."

There was much opposition in the Senate to the treaty, and it was under consideration by that body from August 8, 1914, to February 18, 1916. It was ratified, however, at the latter date. The final confirmation of the treaty is dependent in this case upon the action of the House. If we appropriate the $3,000,000 named as the consideration for the concessions, the treaty becomes effective. If we do not appropriate the money, it fails. As the chairman of the committee [Mr. FITZGERALD] has well said, we have the absolute right to grant or withhold as we see fit. We are under no compulsion. If we do not deem it our duty to accept, we have the right to reject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this the only opportunity the House has to question the appropriation of this money?

Mr. TOWNER. It is; and if we pass the appropriation, we have in effect given the treaty our approval.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In other words, at this point only we have to determine whether or not we must swallow what has been done by another body or by agents of the Government in our name.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that that is true. But we are not in any manner bound by the action either of Mr. Bryan in negotiating the treaty or by the Senate in ratifying it. If we deem the action unwise or if we are averse to paying the money, we are under no obligation to give it our approval and vote the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, the controversy between the Nicaraguan and Panama Canal routes, as gentlemen well know, waged for years. The United States decided to build a canal on the Panama route. The canal was built. It is now proposed to buy a right on the discarded Nicaraguan route.

The Nicaraguan route, by way of the great Lake of Nicaragua and the San Juan River, has been for many years earnestly protested by other Central American powers. These protests have been urged as against the present treaty. In the resolution of ratification passed by the Senate the protests of Costa Rica, Salvador, and Honduras are referred to, and a declaration is made that nothing in the treaty "is intended to affect any existing right of any of the said named States." This is far from satisfactory to these countries, for it is well understood by them that if the United States acquires rights by the treaty it will, if to its interest, insist on them notwithstanding the adverse claims and protests of these countries.

It may be of interest and advantage to refer to the claim of Costa Rica that the ratification of this treaty is an invasion of her rights. The boundary line between Costa Rica and Nicaragua has been in controversy for almost a century. A large part of this boundary line as at present established is the great Lake Nicaragua and the San Juan River. This is also the route granted by Nicaragua in the treaty for the construction and operation of a new interoceanic canal. To acquire a right from Nicaragua in a territory claimed by Costa Rica is to determine in advance the merits of the Costa Rican claim. Besides, it is Costa Rica's claim that if the proposed canal is to follow an admitted or established boundary she is as much entitled to have her rights considered as is the country on the other side of the line.

From the very first Costa Rica has protested against the right of the United States to enter into such a treaty with Nicaragua without at least a final determination of the matters growing out of the boundary controversy. During the consideration of this treaty Costa Rica has specifically protested that the treaty grant for canal purposes lies exterior to the territorial lines of Nicaragua, and that for the United States to acquire by treaty from Nicaragua such a grant upon which to base a claim would be an invasion of her rights.

As long ago as 1851, when Daniel Webster was Secretary of State, the same proposition was under consideration, and in a letter of instruction to the American chargé d'affaires, written by Mr. Webster in that year, he said:

It is well known that for some time past there has been a dispute between the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica respecting the boundary, and it is certain that until this shall be adjusted the United States can not undertake to guarantee to Nicaragua dominion over the line of the canal to it, impliedly at least, by deciding that dispute in her favor and engaging to maintain that decision by force should that become necessary.

It would appear that the statesman's view of the controversy is that until all questions affecting the boundary controversy have been finally settled the United States should not acquire rights from one party to the controversy to enforce which it must antagonize the other. Daniel Webster thought it both unjust and unwise to do so. It would at least appear that such facts constitute a grave and fundamental objection to our approval of this proposition at this time.

Certain phases of the boundary controversy were submitted by Nicaragua and Costa Rica for arbitration to President Cleveland in 1888. In the award it was determined that Costa Rica had certain navigable rights in the San Juan River. It was decided that Nicaragua had the right to make certain improvements providing these improvements did not damage Costa Rican territory or impair her rights to the navigation of the San Juan River. It was also decided that—

Costa Rica can deny to the Republic of Nicaragua the right of deviating the waters of the San Juan in case such deviation will result in the destruction or serious impairment of the navigation of said river or any of its branches at any point where Costa Rica is entitled to navigate the same.

It was especially provided in the award:

The Republic of Nicaragua remains bound not to make any grants for canal purposes across her territory without first asking the opinion of the Republic of Costa Rica, as provided in article 8 of the treaty of limits, April 15, 1858.

From this it would appear that by the arbitral award of our own President Nicaragua has no right to grant concessions to us across her territory for canal purposes without the consent of Costa Rica. Yet not only has such consent not been obtained, but Costa Rica is bitterly and strenuously protesting against such violation of her rights. It certainly can not be the purpose of Congress to violate both our own arbitral award and what it has determined are valid treaty rights in the acquirement of a questionable benefit in our own interest. Because Costa Rica is a small nation and unable to resist by force of arms the impositions of the United States should make us more reluctant to assert them than anxious to enforce them.

Mr. Chairman, we are asked to consider and determine in a few minutes what the Senate held under consideration for a year and a half. It is unfair to the House and an injustice to the country thus to legislate upon such an important matter.

This treaty was negotiated by Mr. Bryan and presented for ratification together with another with the Republic of Colombia. According to the Colombian treaty we were to pay to that Republic $25,000,000 for her rights in the Panama Territory, of which it was claimed we had unjustly deprived her. Besides this we were required to apologize for a wrongful act. That treaty has never been approved, and it is to be hoped that it never will be; but Mr. Bryan would certainly have strengthened his demand for reparation to Colombia if he had not coupled with it an imposition on Costa Rica.

It is a legitimate subject of inquiry why the payment of $3,000,000 is not to be made direct to the Republic of Nicaragua, and why the disbursement of the fund is to be made "in a manner to be determined by the two high contracting parties." It is true that such disbursement is to be made "for the advancement of the welfare of Nicaragua," but how, in what manner, or to whom these payments are to be made is not disclosed. Why the United States, having paid the money for the concession, is also allowed to determine how the money shall be used is a further pertinent inquiry.

Some light is thrown on the matter by a statement made in the International Whitaker Handbook for 1914, an English authority of knowledged high standing. Referring to the financial standing of Nicaragua at that time it states:

"In May, 1909, the Nicaraguan Government obtained a foreign loan of £1,250,000, issuing gold bonds with interest at 6 per cent. The product of the sale of these bonds was to pay off the British loan of 1886 (£245,000) and the United States loan of 1904 (£200,000), while £435,000 was set aside for the construction of a new railroad from Lake Nicaragua to Monkey Point, on the Atlantic seaboard. The 1912 government entered into negotiations for a $20,000,000 gold loan in the United States of America. In June, 1912, the government defaulted in the payment of interest on the 6 per cent bonds and entered into an agreement with the bondholders for the substitution of other securities with a scheme of payments. Up to September, 1913, the American bankers had advanced only $1,000,000, while they held as security all the revenues (including customs and railways) and practically control the Banco Nacional."

[During the reading of the above statement, the time of Mr. TOWNER expired and, by unanimous consent, his time was extended.]

So it appears that certain American bankers are interested in the financial condition of Nicaragua. It is, of course, apparent that they are in large part the beneficiaries of this fund, and that to secure to them payment the Government of the United States undertakes not only to pay the money, but to see that they get it. It is an ungracious but certainly a relevant suggestion that the assiduity and insistence with which this questionable treaty has been pressed may have had its inspiration with certain "American bankers."

It is a curious commentary on affairs of state, and especially on political questions as allied to them, that this self-evident child of "dollar diplomacy" should have been fathered by Mr. Bryan, whose denunciations of that unholy policy are yet ringing in our ears.

It is to be remembered that Mr. Bryan proposed, solicited, and pressed for ratification with all the influence he possessed this treaty, which unquestionably is in its most essential elements an example of "dollar diplomacy." If this treaty is approved and it is made, those who would be principally benefited would not be the people of Nicaragua, but the American bondholders and American bankers. Indeed, it is quite likely, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, that "Nicaragua will not see any of the money." I can not think it would appeal to the Members of either side of this Chamber that the great powers of the United States in its international relations should be exercised to secure an object pressed by American bankers, who, having taken chances on questionable investments upon which payment has defaulted, now desire the United States to reimburse their losses. Neither can I believe Members on either side can determine it wise to involve the United States in an international controversy in order to see that certain "American bankers" should be paid.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if the acquirement of this possible transisthmian canal route is not a part of a so-called diplomacy scheme, as a part of the preparedness for which the gentleman has been such an earnest advocate, and in order to prevent some other Government from acquiring the right which might involve this country in serious international complications?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that I have certainly not advocated any such scheme of preparedness as he suggests, and I have tried to show that the probable inspiration of the treaty had its source, not in patriotic motives, but in the interest of the persons who invested their money in Nicaragua and wanted the United States to assist them in getting it paid.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That may be true; but if the Government of Nicaragua owes the money it ought to pay it, and if they owe it to American bankers I am a little more interested in having it paid than I should be to the bankers of some other country. They got the money just the same, and we acquire the right which might possibly prevent some hostile country from acquiring the canal.

Mr. TOWNER. I have no doubt that that is the view the gentleman takes, and that is the view apparently of his party.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the only iniquitous scheme that has been covered by the cloak of preparedness and passed in such disguise. Objections to questionable proposals are silenced by the assertion that they are necessary for national defense. With an empty Treasury, with appropriations piling up to heights never reached before, with stamp taxes and war taxes and taxes of every description on everything in sight, with bond issues inevitable—still we are asked to spend more. If objection is made, if we protest that bankruptcy impends if such reckless extravagance is not stopped, we are told that we must make these appropriations, no matter what the expense, in order to "prepare." We are asked to pay $3,000,000 to Nicaragua to acquire an additional canal right to prevent a European power from buying it. If we did not buy it and a European power should propose to do so and we deemed such acquisition of territorial rights inimical, we would protest, as we would have a right to do under the principle of the Monroe doctrine. We are asked to build another canal to protect the Panama Canal. One wonders at the logical process that would justify the acquisition of another canal to lessen the difficulty of protecting the one we now have. That argument means, that whereas it is difficult to protect one canal, therefore it is easy to protect two. In view of the selfish ulterior interests that would appear to be the principal beneficiaries of the proposed legislation, there is justification for doubt as to the good faith of the preparedness argument.

It would seem a questionable policy, to say the least, to take action in this matter, which necessarily constitutes a direct infringement upon the asserted rights of another nation if we really desire to strengthen our standing among the nations of the world. It can not be taken as an earnest of good faith in our proclaimed endeavor to court the favor and good will of all the brotherhood of American nations to persist in taking action against one of them, involving rights which we have in the most solemn manner admitted and confirmed. The House should not irrevocably commit the country to action in this very important matter without at least abundant opportunity to consider and determine its merits.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse the fund "General account advances," Navy Department, the balance due on account of repairs made to the former revenue cutter Onondaga, at the Norfolk Navy yard, under authority of department letter dated May 22, 1912, being for the service of the fiscal year 1912, $700.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to get some information with respect to this item of $700 to reimburse the fund in the Navy Department for the repair of the Onondaga. When were these repairs made, and how much was the total bill? I notice in a note in the estimates that the cost of repairing the Onondaga greatly exceeded the estimate given by the navy yard. The total of the estimate is not stated. I ask to learn whether we can find out how near the navy yard can make an estimate which is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is what happened:

Capt. BERTHOLF. The Onondaga was repaired at the Norfolk Navy Yard in 1912. Of course we had an estimate from the navy yard and we encumbered our appropriation 25 per cent or 30 per cent more than the amount estimated. When the bills came in, it was more than we had estimated. We paid all we could out of the balance left in the appropriation, but there is $700 still due the Navy Department, and they say they must have it.

Mr. MANN. The navy yard made a mistake in their estimate of 25 or 30 per cent?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure whether they did that.

Mr. MANN. I so understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain what happened there. In many of these repair cases surveys are made and an estimate is made of certain work to be done. After the work is started and the boat is ripped open it is often found that very considerable additional work must be done because of conditions that exist which could not be disclosed before the work was started.

Mr. MANN. I was trying to find out whether that was the situation. Apparently it was not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I did not happen to be present when this testimony was taken.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the navy yard is as apt to make a mistake as other people, and everyone knows that mistakes are frequently made and that estimates are not high enough. Still, I have heard so often upon the floor here of how the navy yards could tell exactly what a boat is going to cost to build, a great ship, that I wondered how near they could come to telling what it would cost to make repairs to the extent of two or three thousand dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course the gentleman will understand that I can not vouch for this as it was in the Norfolk Navy Yard. If it had been in the New York Navy Yard, I would have known exactly.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hospital for the Insane: For support of indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, as provided by law, $7,080.64.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking my colleague a question. Is any part of this appropriation—and I am asking entirely for information—required because of an unusually large number of soldiers being sent to this hospital for the insane from the Isthmus of Panama? I have heard reports that soldiers are being sent from the Isthmus of Panama in unusual numbers just at the present time, owing to the conditions on the Isthmus. If it is so, we ought to know about it. I do not know whether it is true, and possibly my colleague can tell me whether this appropriation has any relation to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this item has nothing to do with the soldiers. This is for the insane of the District of Columbia. The insane from the Army are sent to this hospital, but this deficiency has to do with the insane of the District.

Mr. BENNET. I notice that the language is:

For support of indigent insane of the District of Columbia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. That is not construed in any way to cover the soldiers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they are sent differently. This fund would not be available for men from the Regular Army.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman happen to know whether there is any accuracy in the report that I have mentioned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not heard anything with respect to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Judgments: For payment of judgments, including costs, against the District of Columbia, set forth in House Documents No. 1275 and ——— of this session, except the judgments with interest and costs in favor of Samuel T. Kalbfus and Edward S. Wood, $50,559.57, together with a further sum to pay the interest at not exceeding 4 per cent on said judgments, as provided by law, from the date the same became due until the date of payment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 19, line 15, before the word "of," insert "1352," and in line 17 strike out the sum "$50,559.57" and insert the sum "$50,532.17."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the character of these judgments that are provided for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That are excepted?

Mr. MANN. No; that we provide for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall have to refer to the document. Does the gentleman mean the two judgments enumerated here?

Mr. MANN. No; the ones that we paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The first case, amounting to $7,300 and costs, was one for personal injuries, and then there is a sum for the refund of taxes in the case of the Georgetown Gas Light Co. of $3,241, and in the case of the Washington Gas Light Co. of $31,321.62. Those were the chief ones.

Mr. MANN. It seemed to me that it was a rather large amount if it was for personal-injury cases.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Thirty-five thousand dollars is for refund of taxes in two cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

One-half of the foregoing amounts to meet deficiencies in the appropriations on account of the District of Columbia shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. These deficiencies for the District of Columbia amount in all to about $183,000. The expenses of the District of Columbia are paid, according to the present law, one-half out of the Federal Treasury and one-half out of the revenues of the District. Yesterday we took final action in this House on the District appropriation bill, by which we continued in force for the present fiscal year the old half-and-half law. We did that because, very naturally, that bill contained so many other good items that it would have been a calamity to the people of the District, as well as to the people of the United States, for the bill to have been defeated by the comparatively small element who were fighting for the retention of the half-and-half principle. That bill contained the reduction of the price of gas to consumers in the District to 75 cents, and contained a provision for the taxation of intangible personal property, which has never been a law in the District of Columbia. I want to point out this fact. These appropriations for deficiencies amount to only $183,000. We appropriated about $12,500,000 for the fiscal year 1916. Therefore, with these deficiencies, we are spending less than $13,000,000 in governing the District of Columbia, and governing it well, governing it in a high-grade way. The District now raises upon the ordinary property owner, the small home owner, the small merchant, and the tax on real estate and tangible property, $8,000,000. If we tax intangible property in the District with any degree of fairness and honesty at all, we will raise from two and a half millions to three millions more. In other words, the taxes raised for the next fiscal year in the District will equal or exceed $11,000,000, and we have never been able to spend exceeding $13,000,000 in the best government of the District that we could give it. It does seem to me that the argument is conclusive against the maintenance further of the half-and-half principle—that we are under compulsion to contribute out of the Federal Treasury another $11,000,000 because $11,000,000 is raised in the District. To undertake to spend $22,000,000 on the local government of the District of Columbia is a manifest absurdity. It can not be done honestly.

It only results in this, gentlemen, that we should have done what we did yesterday. The District bill ought not to have failed this year, and ought not to have been continued by a continuing resolution, thereby leaving out all reforms and continuing all abuses. We should have done what we did yesterday, to wit, recede from the half-and-half in order to gain the tax upon intangible property and the reduction of the gas rate; yet it is now perfectly manifest that it is absolutely essential that the half-and-half principle shall be abolished. That is in accordance with the result of eight years' discussion and agitation in this House and a very carefully prepared report by a special commission of Members of this House and the Senate, who reviewed all the evidence in the case, reviewed the expenses of the District, all the taxation laws of other cities of comparable size, and all the evidence bearing upon the justness of the half-and-half principle. So that now it is clear that the time has come when the half-and-half principle—that is to say, the arbitrary contribution of a dollar out of the Federal Treasury for every dollar raised in the District—must fall of its own weight. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few moments ago I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to say about $35,000 of the amount appropriated for the payment of judgments against the District of Columbia was to refund taxes collected against the gas companies. I take it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Judgments in favor of the gas companies.

Mr. MANN. Judgment in favor of the gas companies, to refund taxes which they had paid. They could not get a judgment to collect taxes which they had not paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But if we paid back those taxes the District of Columbia taxes will not all go into the District fund in the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One-half goes into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; taxes collected in the District of Columbia go to the District fund. We match that with an appropriation out of the Treasury. Now, having collected the taxes and paid the money into the District fund, apparently, the gas companies obtain a judgment and get those taxes back, and we propose to pay half of that out of the Treasury.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That should be corrected; that should be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District; and before the bill is completed an amendment will be prepared.

Mr. MANN. It should be corrected in this item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent to pass the item for the present, so that an amendment may be prepared to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the item mentioned will be passed over without prejudice. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, on page 19, after line 25, I have an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 25, page 19, add as a new paragraph:
"For the remodeling, repairs, and improvement of the Federal building at St. Augustine, St. Johns County, Fla., $2,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment I will state the post-office building at St. Augustine, or the Federal building in which the public duties are performed, is in a very congested condition. Some time this year I introduced a bill to overcome that, because I found upon investigation that with the expenditure of a few hundred dollars this building could be repaired and remodeled to meet the requirements for the present. It is an old building constructed by the Spaniards, and they desire to retain it and preserve it. The roof is in a bad condition, and they need a new door in order to get in and out of the building. It is also necessary to rearrange partitioning in order that there may be more floor space. I did not press the bill, because while the sundry civil bill was up for consideration I saw Mr. FITZGERALD, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and talked with him relative to same, and he stated there was an appropriation in the sum of some $800,000, I believe, to meet just such conditions as my bill was intended to meet. I so wrote my constituents at St. Augustine, and told them there would be no trouble in getting these improvements because of this appropriation included in the sundry civil bill. On July 22 I wrote the Supervising Architect, stating that I had had this conversation with Mr. FITZGERALD, in which I was informed that the appropriation in the sundry civil bill would meet the requirements of my bill, and that they could proceed under that. That letter is in part as follows:

DEAR SIR: Some time ago I introduced a bill, in the sum of $2,000, for the purpose of improving the post office at St. Augustine. When the sundry civil bill was up for consideration, I took the matter up with Mr. FITZGERALD, chairman of the committee, and he stated it was not necessary to insist on the bill, as an appropriation in bulk had been made to cover such cases.

On August 17 I received a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury simply acknowledging receipt of the letter I wrote him and stating the department had secured the data for the specifications for the work on the St. Augustine building. On August 26 there was written to the postmaster at St. Augustine a letter by the superintendent of construction, from which I will quote the following:

The bill for the proposed remodeling, repair, and improvement of the building is still pending in Congress. A report was submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives on May 11, 1916. No action looking to the remodeling of the building can be taken until legislation has been enacted authorizing same. It will, therefore, be unnecessary for you to complete the drawings for this work; but if there is any necessary repair work which, in your opinion, should be taken up at once, you are requested to consider the same and submit the drawings referred to by you.

Now, Mr. Chairman, they are undertaking only to put in some new flooring and minor repairs, and the work the department will do at St. Augustine under other appropriations will not give any relief. I spoke to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] again yesterday about the matter, and he is still of the opinion that the appropriation in the sundry civil bill can be used for purposes as stated in my bill. It is very important that the extra door be placed in the building. In old-style buildings at St. Augustine the doors are small. There is only one entrance by which to get in and out, as I remember, and there should be an entrance at the other end of the building, which the Members of this House know would not cost very much. If it can be made out of the appropriation of $800,000, then I would not insist on this amendment. If the roof can not be repaired and the door can not be placed in the building and the partition removed without this appropriation, I believe the House will grant it to me. If any of you have been in this building, you will know we are entitled to this relief.

I offered this amendment in order that I might learn whether or not my bill is covered by the appropriation of $800,000 in the sundry civil bill and if the chairman believes the department is justified in proceeding at St. Augustine under said appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I do not administer the appropriation. The sundry civil bill carries $800,000 for repair and preservation of public buildings. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] stated what it was desired to do at the post office in St. Augustine, and I expressed the opinion that the work contemplated consisted of repairs for which appropriation had been made. If it be not an item of repair to fix a leaky roof or cut a door where a door is needed or to shift a partition from one place to another in a building, then I do not understand the meaning of the word "repairs," either as used in a legislative form or commonly by the ordinary person. The purpose, of course, of making lump-sum appropriations for repairs to public buildings is to place upon the department that has charge of the public buildings the responsibility of determining the necessity for expenditures and the allotment of the funds for expenditures most imperative. It seems to me that if the condition be as stated by the gentleman from Florida, he ought to convince the Treasury Department that it is not a scheme for remodeling a building, which involves only the expenditure of $2,000, but it is merely to have certain imperative and necessary repairs for which the appropriation is available. It is impossible for the committee to determine whether any particular building should be repaired or what sum is essential. So the practice is followed of putting the matter within the control of the department. Under the circumstances I can not accept the amendment of the gentleman to this bill.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman, then, is of the opinion the door could be cut in the building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think cutting a door in the building is a repair of the building. Of course, I may not be a mechanic of the character required to determine that question, but that would be the construction I would put upon the expression. If I wanted to cut a door in the building belonging to myself I would consider it repair. I would not consider it the construction of a new building.

Mr. SEARS. I am of the same opinion, but the department does not seem to be of that opinion, and, as stated, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to get myself clear in the RECORD to show it is not an oversight on my part.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be that some one in the department will acquire knowledge of the meaning of the word "repair" and apply it to this situation.

Mr. Chairman. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York contend——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I contend it is not authorized; it is not in order; it is not germane to this portion of the bill, and there are a dozen different reasons.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SEARS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FITZGERALD: On page 19, at the end of line 25, insert:

"Except the amounts of the judgments, including costs, aggregating $34,637.36, in favor of the Georgetown Gas Light Co. and the Washington Gas Light Co., which judgments and costs shall be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. FITZGERALD. The word "interest" must be put in before the word "costs" in both places.

Mr. MANN. Where it first occurs, the judgments and costs aggregating a certain amount, interest should not go in there. Interest should go in where it provides later; where it occurs the second time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARRISON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendments numbered 58 and 108 to the bill (H. R. 15774) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes; also that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 361 to said bill.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except the amounts of the judgments and costs aggregating $34,637.36, in favor of the Georgetown Gas Light Co. and the Washington Gas Light Co., which judgments and costs and interest thereon shall be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The pay of the superintendent of the building occupied by the Army Medical Museum and Library, provided in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917 at $250, is reduced to $200.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, strike out lines 12 to 16, both inclusive.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the paragraph, lines 12 to 16, obviously is to reduce the salary of the superintendent of the building occupied by the Medical Museum and Library, from $250 to $200, as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act fixes his salary this year at $250. Has the chairman of the committee any reason to give for this proposed reduction?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. This is attributed to the efforts of several distinguished Members of the House to demonstrate their interest in the policy of economy. They are hunting around for an opportunity to show that they are interested in conserving the public funds and demonstrating their desire to economize in public expenditures; they appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and made this request. Like most of these spasmodic efforts on the part of voluntary economists, however, it appears that the saving of this $50 results in an expenditure of $150 instead, so that for every $50 saved a 300 per cent increase results in expenditures.

It happens in this way: The clerk who was detailed or designated as superintendent of the Army Medical Museum and Library was a clerk of class 3, whose compensation is $1,600 a year. Under a beneficent Democratic administration, recognizing his long and valuable services to the Government, he has been promoted to class 4, receiving a compensation of $1,800 a year. Under the law no one in the Government service can receive two compensations if the aggregate is in excess of $2,000. It is desirable that the very valuable services of this man as superintendent of this building be retained, and in order to retain him and at the same time give him the benefits of the promotion which his long and valuable services have entitled him to, it is necessary to reduce the compensation to be given to the present detail as superintendent.

The gentleman who discovered the situation, impelled by a stern sense of duty and by a patriotic desire to save money, persuaded the committee that here was an opportunity to demonstrate a position where the House would unanimously vote to economize in the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for having given most of my argument for me. It is apparent that this beneficent Democratic administration, having promoted a man once, is not content with that philanthropic and altogether meritorious circumstance, but wants to promote him twice at the same time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is not promoted twice at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is, he has been promoted from a salary of $1,600 to a salary of $1,800 a year, and, not content with that, they want to add $200 more to it by cutting down the salary of another job under the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has been receiving $1,850, $1,600 as a clerk of class 3 and $250 as superintendent. Then he was promoted to a clerk of class 4.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As a clerk of class 4 he receives $1,800, so that that promotion, if the detail is taken away from him, resulted in a decrease of salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In order that he would not be deprived of the benefits of a promotion, this is really to secure him an increase of $150.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was not this clerk promoted during this administration from the class in which he received $1,600 to the $1,800 class? Then was not this position of superintendent of the building taken away from another man in the building and given to him instead?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then this position was formerly held by another man?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not my understanding.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is my understanding, although I may be misinformed. Of course I do not want to put any misstatement of the facts into the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no information of the fact. The statement was made as to this man, or what I understood was a statement—because I do not wish to misunderstand myself or misundertsand a statement that others have given me—the statement to me or the committee was that this man had for a number of years been detailed as superintendent of the Army Medical Museum. He has been there some time. He has been promoted to a fourth-class clerkship, and he can not be retained in this detail under the law at that rate.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand the legal effect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not understand that he has recently been given a detail.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, that it was a recent promotion in the sense of months, perhaps, but since the beginning of this administration. But it does not change the color of the transaction, so far as its effect is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would be a matter of extreme gratification to me to know that somebody has been found sufficiently meritorious to be promoted twice.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If some one can be found of that character, I will withdraw that amendment. The effect, however, whatever may have been the laudable purpose of the Democratic administration to find some man worthy to be promoted twice before they went out on the 4th of March is that the man who is considered worthy to have this trifling addition to his salary as superintendent of the building—a position which carries only $250 and which would eke out the salary of an old soldier working as janitor—has that salary now reduced $50 so that this man who has had one raise can get the extra sum in addition to the other raise. It will not go, in consequence, to the old soldier whom all the people there in the building want to have it. That is the effect of this wonderful economy of $50, and I think under the circumstances in obvious fairness it should be given to the old soldier, who is barely getting a living wage now. We should give to him this trifle of $250 rather than to another man who has already been raised once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know anything about the personnel, or who these deserving persons are. As a matter of fact, I can not say that there is anybody in the Government service in Washington for whose existence I can claim any particular credit [laughter], so that I am wholly impersonal in my relations in connection with these employees. I am more impartial, even, than the gentlemen who are not associated with the party in power and who are worrying lest some friend of theirs may be eliminated from the public service, because I had nobody to continue and I have had nobody put in. I occupy an ideal position for the discharge of my public duties as a Member of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If I were in the embarrassing situation of the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not in an embarrassing situation——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman ought not to admit any embarrassment, if the gentleman will allow me to suggest, because his remarkable poise never shows any embarrassment. [Laughter.]

If I were in the position of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I never would permit myself to know anything about how the money I appropriated went.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I could not afford to do as the gentleman suggests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Vermont be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I thank the gentleman. I want to get $50 worth of time anyway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, with pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I am not authorized to speak for the Appropriations Committee, but as an ordinary Member of the House, moderately observant of the proceedings here, I want to thank the gentleman from Vermont for having raised this question. It indicates that he is watchful of the proceedings. The saving of $50 at this time is of more importance perhaps than the gentleman conceives. Fifty dollars will come in handy just now, in the matter of efficiency and economy, and to promote the welfare of the administration. The gentleman was here yesterday when we passed a $50,000,000 shipping bill. We must get that money and this $50 will help. In fact, "every little helps."

Mr. FITZGERALD. It seems to be a case of 50-50.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The $250 salary that I am trying to get for a poor old soldier will do more good for the country than the $50,000,000 that is being appropriated in the attempt of the Democratic administration, like Mrs. Partington, to sweep back the Atlantic Ocean with a broom. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But just see how far this $50 we take from this old soldier will go toward providing the $50,000,000 necessary to meet the shipping bill appropriation! [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, the old soldier will not be here, nor will any of us be here to see any substantial good done by the shipping bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but the gentleman appreciates the economy that is now actuating the other side of the House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, it is a deathbed repentance.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I call his attention to the fact that we need the money.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We do, and I am trying to get it for the old soldier.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About a month ago, as the gentleman remembers, we passed a bill to construct a nitrate plant at a cost of $15,000,000. This $50 will help to pay for that $15,000,000 nitrate plant. It will help very much in that direction. The gentleman is cognizant of what goes on here, and he knows that yesterday the President signed the bill for a greater Navy. In that bill we provided for the establishment of an armor-plate factory to cost $11,000,000. Just see what we can do with this $50, if we take it away from that old soldier!

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Bear in mind how it would relieve us if we could find other $50 items to store up against the expenditures we have provided for! This is a good time to economize. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am glad to get something out of this, and if time were money I ought to make a fair profit. I have only to suggest that while this matter is trifling, in the broader sense of national interest, or perhaps of the deliberations of this House——

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Just a moment. Let me have an opportunity to make my speech, or a part of it anyway. While of course there is no question here which concerns the important deliberations of this floor generally, yet it seems to me that it is such a picayune proposition that the House ought not to stand for it. I do not suggest by that that the chairman of the committee had any knowledge as to the real personal effect of this item. I am glad to acknowledge that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has an embarrassing position, and he does not want to know personally where this money does go, and I really do not blame him. But in this instance it does have the effect—and this is the personal application of it—of making it impossible to carry out what is a general disposition, as I understand it, among those connected with the Army Medical Museum, to give an old soldier a little pittance of $250 more on top of his pay, because he can perform these duties just as well in the position where he is. The proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is to add $200 to the compensation of a man who is already well recompensed, and whose pay has recently been raised in the civil service, a man who holds an assured position. It gives to him the little mite that might more profitably, and I think more in the spirit of our institutions and our general policy, go to this old soldier. And when we think about a man who is willing, one might say, to have a thumb chopped off of his hand so he can reach out at least four fingers after the money, it seems to me that he is resorting to a little bit of a proposition, when this old soldier has not reached out any hand for money at all. He did his reaching out about fifty-odd years ago, in order that there might be some money for anybody to have.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that there is no intention to change the superintendent? No old soldier is to be turned out of office and somebody else put in his place.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is the same superintendent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. The only reason why that is not done is because there is a permanent law against it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman was objecting, as I understood, because this would deprive some old soldier of $250.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does exactly that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Then he also states that he knows the fact to be that it does not do that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no; I said it was a question of adding to the pittance which he now receives.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman understands that no old soldier holds the place now?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that, exactly. I said distinctly that I understood it was intended to give it to him.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. To give what?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To give this position—to let him have it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They can do that anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has again expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, do not be parsimonious. Let us make it five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. When I read this bill the other day and struck this item, I nearly fell over in a faint. On its face it apparently contemplated the reduction of a salary from $250 to $200 a year. Now, we are in the middle of a campaign. This side of the House has been charging the other side of the House with extravagant appropriations. As I look at the item I can see one purpose for which it might be inserted. It might have been inserted so that every Democratic campaign orator on the stump and elsewhere might point to one case where a Democratic majority had apparently reduced a clerk's pay, and apparently effected an economy. Because on its face it provides that the pay of the superintendent shall be reduced from $250 to $200. Think how effective it would be for the gentleman from New York, discussing to his constituents and apologizing for the speech he made two years ago roasting his side of the House, to explain that the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations had brought in a bill, and passed it, making a decided economy in the public service by reducing a salary $50 a year. [Laughter.] I could see the purpose of that, and yet it did not occur to me that even under such circumstances it was likely to be true, that they had really effected an economy. So I concluded that I would look further into the reason of it, and as I looked into the reason of it I found that for this apparent saving of $50 it would cost the Government $200 to do it.

The other day we passed a bill providing that no one in the Government service might receive two salaries where the combined two salaries amounted to more than $2,000 a year. I do not know how many cases it may cover; we found one the other day of an employee of the House and we fixed it. In the course of their search the departments have found one other case and we propose to fix that. The law looks fine on its face, but wherever it applies we propose to change the application; and so that a man may get $2,000 we apparently cut off $50 of his salary in order that he may draw $200 of it, because if this cutting off was not made it would make the combined salaries $2,050 and he could not draw this or any part of it.

It will be heralded all over the country. I expect to hear of this many times in Chicago, stating how a great Democratic majority, led by the distinguished economist, the gentleman from New York, has apparently saved $50 to apply to the shipping bill or the nitrate bill or some other bill. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will be accurate in his language, not say "apparently save," but actually save.

Mr. MANN. It does not save it actually, for it costs $200, and the gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it is not adopted somebody else will get $250.

Mr. MANN. This House would not provide for that. It is possible that the administration will spend every cent of this appropriation regardless of any economy, and there is no reason for it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX. If I catch the drift of the gentleman's remarks, in order to enable some man down there to draw two salaries, $50 must be cut off.

Mr. MANN. That is absolutely the case in a nutshell.

Mr. COX. I am against it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman's statement may be technically correct, it is wholly misleading.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No; let me make my statement. The proposition here is to reduce the salary from $250 to $200 in order that a certain employee down there may receive it who otherwise could not get it. That is the truth. But this is further true. Under the law the salary of the superintendent is $250, which is to be paid to some man in that department who already draws a salary. This man has been in that department for nearly 30 years.

Mr. HARRISON. Thirty-four years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Thirty-four years. He was receiving $1,600, and was made superintendent of the building, and has given perfectly satisfactory service to the director. He is a thoroughly efficient man. It is the opinion of the director that the particular desk that this gentleman occupies ought to be the desk which discharges the duties of the superintendent of that building.

Now, in the course of time, due solely to his efficiency, this gentleman has recently been promoted to an $1,800 clerkship. It will then become necessary to change the superintendent, or give it to somebody else—somebody else not desired by the director. In other words, somebody else who has not been preferred by the director. The director wants the same man. He is thoroughly efficient and has discharged his duties in a perfectly satisfactory manner. When it became apparent that this particular man could not serve, because we had adopted a rule that no two salaries when combined should exceed $2,000 to be paid to the same man, I went before the subcommittee and presented to them the facts and asked them to change the law in this particular case so that what the director desired to be done could be done.

It did not occur to me that anybody would object. I do not see how anybody can object. There is no question of any old soldier about it at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, no. This man was already on the job, had it all of the while. It was a question of efficiency of administration of the particular office, and in order to make it possible it required an act of the legislature, which reduced the pay $50 a year. I hope that the House will agree to it. I hope that this $50 will be stricken from it, not for the purpose of saving the $50, though, of course, everyone knows that I am perhaps the most noted economist in the House and that that would appeal to me perhaps more strongly than to anybody else, except possibly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]; but that is not the reason that inspires me, not at all. There is absolutely no reason that I can conceive of why the director over there should not be permitted to have this man whom he has selected long ago as superintendent, simply because the $50 would have to be taken off the pay roll. There are no two promotions about it at all. As I said, the gentleman has been in the department for some 30 years. He was getting $1,600 and also getting a superintendent's pay, which made it $1,850 a year. He has now been promoted to $1,800, and he loses $50 by his promotion if he has to give up the other position of superintendent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And gains $200.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont to strike out the paragraph contained in lines 12 to 16 on page 21.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GREENE of Vermont) there were—ayes 16, noes 17.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Chief of Ordnance: Clerks—2 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 4 of class 2, 9 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each, 1 $900; messengers—1 at $780, and 1 at $720.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The bill provides for some increase in the clerical force of the War Department, an increase which I do not doubt is absolutely needed. I notice there seems to be no provision in the bill in reference to an increase in any of the auditor's offices. I have assumed that probably there was as much need for an increase in the office of the Auditors of the Navy and the War Departments as there is for an increase in the War Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has been no request for any additional clerical service for the auditor. I have been informed unofficially that there will be detailed to the Auditor for the War Department 30 additional clerks. I assume that they will be found in the various bureaus of the Treasury Department where they can be spared.

Mr. MANN. That may be. I do not know. I do not know how it is possible to conduct the auditing of the Navy and the War Departments and keep it anywhere near up to date without additional help from some source.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt that the work will be very greatly increased in the auditor's offices, and the information has been given that the Auditor for the War Department anticipates to use at least 30 additional clerks that will be assigned to him, and it is possible that the Treasury Department expects to take care of those offices.

Mr. MANN. I do not see where they will get them by detail, but still they may know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can always find a few extra ones.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman might have said the same about the War Department, but you can not make appropriations amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, covering very large service, without providing additional clerical help.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee endeavored to do what was right, and I believe treated both the War and the Navy Departments in a manner that ought to be satisfactory.

We increased the clerical service, for instance, in The Adjutant General's Office in the War Department by 100 clerks, and it was done upon a showing that persuaded the committee that the clerks would be necessary, and there have been no estimates submitted for any additional help for the auditors. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself know that these departments never hesitate to ask.

Mr. MANN. I know that they usually ask. I never have found any great backwardness in that respect. We want the auditing kept up to date. That is in the interest of everyone who does business with the War and Navy Departments. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARMORIES AND ARSENALS.

Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa.: For repair of sea wall, fiscal year 1917, $23,400.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this repair of the sea wall at the Frankford Arsenal is necessary?

Mr. EDMONDS rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the fact that it appears in the bill is evidence of its necessity. It has been proven before the Committee on Appropriations. There is unquestionably a necessity for the construction of this sea wall at this arsenal.

Mr. MANN. What has this to do with navigation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Everything, because without the construction of this wall navigation to a very large extent would be impeded at the Frankford Arsenal.

Mr. MANN. Then, this is for the purpose of aiding navigation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not only to aid navigation, but it is to improve and keep the property in good order.

Mr. MANN. They slipped it into the Army bill to aid navigation at Philadelphia?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We do whatever is fair to get the necessary things for this arsenal, which is now doing as much as any arsenal can do to uphold the hands of the Army and the Navy. It should be adequately equipped.

Mr. MANN. And empty the Treasury?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, we have succeeded——

Mr. MANN. I am not complaining.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What the gentleman said is just giving us an opportunity to explain the merits of this proposition, which I thought would be wholly unnecessary, in view of the fact that almost everyone knows about the Frankford Arsenal and its value to the country.

Mr. MANN. Well, I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question without designating which gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I intended to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. EDMONDS——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] very gladly.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Near whose district or close to whose district this is.

Mr. EDMONDS. This is not in my district, but I was at the arsenal the other day and saw the partially completed sea wall. If this wall is not completed the real purpose of the sea wall along the river will be defeated. It is to be finished by this appropriation; a portion of it has been already done by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., covering where their tracks run through the arsenal property, and that was done at their own expense.

Mr. MANN. It is to prevent the Pennsylvania Railroad spending any more money?

Mr. EDMONDS. No, it is not; it has nothing to do with it. If this wall is completed it will add a considerable piece of ground to the arsenal that is now swampy and slipping into the river and requires the river frequently to be dredged out.

Mr. MANN. It is to finish what the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. was doing?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is not near where this wall is being built. They built their portion and finished it.

Mr. MANN. That would not be an argument against it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rock Island (Ill.) Arsenal: For one lumber storage house, fiscal year 1917, $7,500.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Here is an item for the Rock Island (Ill.) Arsenal, and it is just possible that some Members of the House may not have had the benfit of the explanation that has been made before the Committee on Appropriations of the House as to the necessity for this improvement. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he can tell us whether there is any necessity for this appropriation of $7,500 for the Rock Island Arsenal?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman referring to me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Possibly this is not in the district of the gentleman from Illinois, but there may be some other gentleman from Illinois who can explain whether this recommended appropriation is necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is a mere waste of time. Yes, it is necessary or it would not have been in here any more than the one for Frankford would have been in here if it were not necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That goes without saying. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the railway situation. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether that also includes anything in regard to the senatorial situation of Texas?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; it has nothing to do with that, except I hope the strike will not touch the great Lone Star State.

Mr. EAGLE. The gentleman is always right except on a question of partisanship.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

RIVER AND HARBOR WORK.

To pay the claims adjusted and settled under section 4 of the river and harbor appropriation act approved June 25, 1910, and certified to Congress in House Documents Nos. 691, 993, 1019, 1281, and 1298 at the present session, $1,226.20.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 6 for the purpose of offering two amendments to the provision——

Mr. MANN. Let us hear what the amendments are.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the purpose of offering two amendments to the provision for the Farm Loan Board. One is an amendment making the appropriation available for the fiscal year 1917. The other is an amendment to permit the expenditure of $10,000 for rent for the housing of bureaus of the Treasury Department which it is desired to move out of the Treasury Building in order to house the Farm Loan Board.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 15, after the word "act" insert the words "also not exceeding $10,000 for rental of quarters in the District of Columbia for such bureaus of the Treasury Department that it may be necessary to move in order to accommodate the Federal Farm Loan Board in the Treasury Building."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman is it a fact that hereafter there must be quarters rented outside the Treasury Building to accommodate the bureaus of the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The situation is this: The Farm Loan Board has been created. Authority was given to rent quarters. It is believed that the Farm Loan Board should be in the Treasury Building. The Federal Reserve Board is there, and it is a bureau in the Treasury Department.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will that necessitate permanent rental of quarters outside of the Treasury Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is necessary to put the Farm Loan Board in the Treasury Building and it is necessary to move some of the bureaus of the Treasury Department out. There are some of the bureaus of the Treasury Department now outside the Treasury Building; for instance, the auditors occupy the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to page 6? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, in line 15, after the amendment just agreed to insert the words "fiscal year 1917."

Mr. MANN. Where does that go in—where does the other amendment come in?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It comes in just before the words "one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. MANN. The first amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment just adopted is inserted after the word "act," in line 15, and following the language inserted comes "fiscal year 1917, $100,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of the Army: For pay of officers and enlisted men, $950,000.

Nothing contained in the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1917 shall be construed as precluding the payment of travel allowance as provided in section 126 of the act approved June 3, 1916, to enlisted men of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States and the appropriation for the transportation of the Army and its supplies for the fiscal year 1917 shall be available for this purpose and also for the purpose of paying travel pay to officers of the National Guard on their discharge from the service of the United States as prescribed in the act approved March 2, 1901.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the complication that has arisen in reference to this matter? I am not familiar with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of enabling the Speaker to sign the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17645) and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15774. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17645.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, Gen. Sharpe, the Acting Quartermaster General, requested this provision to be inserted in the bill for this reason. He said:

The Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917, under the heading "Transportation of the Army and its supplies," provides "for travel allowance to enlisted men on discharge." This provision is immediately followed by language reading:

"And members of the National Guard who have been mustered into the service of the United States and are discharged for physical disabilities: * * * Provided further, That when members of the National Guard, who have been mustered into the service of the United States, have been discharged under the order of the War Department which provides that members of the National Guard with dependent families may be mustered out, transportation from their position on the Mexican border to their homes may be authorized by the Secretary of War."

A reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of July 25 and 26, 1916, pages 13432 and 13364–13365, shows that the above-quoted language following the item "for travel allowance to enlisted men on discharge" was inserted as Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill and that these amendments were proposed in the thought that the enlisted men of the National Guard discharged under the circumstances mentioned in the amendments would not, in the absence of legislation, be entitled to travel allowance on their discharge.

It has uniformly been held that enlisted men discharged on account of having dependent families or discharged on account of physical disability are entitled to travel allowance, so that no legislation was necessary to protect the rights of men of the National Guard discharged from the service of the United States for these two reasons.

While not so intended, the effect of the amendments may be to restrict the use of the appropriation, with respect to the enlisted men of the National Guard, to those discharged from the service (a) on account of physical disability, and (b) on account of having dependent families, giving to the men of class (a) travel allowance at the rate of 3½ cents per mile as provided in section 126 of the act of June 3, 1916, and to the men of class (b) transportation only.

Under this construction of the amendments the appropriation would not be available to pay travel allowance to men of the National Guard discharged from the service of the United States for reasons other than those mentioned under (a) and (b) of the preceding paragraph hereof.

It is desired to have this proviso added to the bill in order to provide transportation to any enlisted men of the National Guard who are discharged honorably from the service.

It is believed by the Quartermaster General that the amendments inserted by the Senate for the purpose of allowing travel allowance to men discharged from the grade mustered into the service because of dependent families or because of physical disabilities will, by construction, prevent the payment of travel allowance to a number of other classes.

Mr. MANN. This Senate amendment, then, was not only useless, but it was an error in that case?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was one of those things where somebody usually says "Put this in, anyway; it will not do any harm, and it will make it sure." And usually such amendment not only does not accomplish what is desired in a particular respect, but usually does a lot of harm in other ways not contemplated by the authors of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Frequently, at least.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And to avoid any such conflicts arising from other reasons than the two enumerated we have been requested to make it absolutely certain that the travel allowance should be paid out of the appropriation intended to the classes entitled under the law to such travel allowance upon discharge.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rent of buildings: For rental of an office for the use of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, $5,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 8, after the word "Corps," insert the words "fiscal year 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Where is this office to be located?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to be in Washington, but it is in the Military Establishment—the Aviation Section.

Mr. MANN. It is intended to move the Aviation Section out of the War Department Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. By reason of the very greatly increased work, the field service wants accommodations where they can have an aviation room for conferences, clerks, some storage facilities, and the like. Provision is made for additional accommodations for the War Department proper in another item, but, by reason of the very greatly increased appropriation from $800,000 to $14,000,000 for the Aviation Corps under the Military Establishment, it is necessary that they have this accommodation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance stores—ammunition: For the purchase or manufacture of ammunition for automatic machine rifles, $210.000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Are these two items deficiencies? I mean these automatic machine rifle items, one of $190,000 for automatic machine rifles and $210.000 for ammunition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Orders were given prior to the 1st of July for some 340 Lewis guns. This is to pay for the portion for which orders were executed in the last fiscal year. They ordered all the machine guns that were available.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation and recruiting: For transportation and recruiting, including the same objects specified under this head in the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, $26,500.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SWEET). The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 36, line 23, strike out the sum of "$26,500" and insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$26,524.18."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the National Mortar Co. for cement bags, $300.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 7, page 37, add as a new paragraph the following: "National Parks: Lassen Volcanic National Park, Cal., for protecting and improvement for the fiscal year 1917, $5,000."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the bill authorizing this park was approved August 9, 1916, and, of course, coming in late, the estimate was sent from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasury Department on August 11, 1916, and then transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives on August 12, 1916. There was no way to get this in the prior bill, because of course the general bill has been through the two Houses and is now a law, and the act limits the appropriation in section 5, by stating that no appropriation for the maintenance, supervision, and improvement of said park in excess of $5,000 annually shall be made unless the same shall have been first expressly authorized by law.

Now, there is no change asked except the $5,000, and the park is in this condition: Having been established, there will be no money to work this fall or next spring, nothing to be done until the 1st of July, 1917. The people of the city of Redding are interested and they are doing a great deal to improve the road and build a State highway from the main trunk line in the Sacramento Valley past the Lassen Volcanic Park on to Susanville, the county seat of Lassen County.

The county of Lassen has agreed to take some $300,000 of the State highway bonds, and they are now working on the road. The State of California is at work on the road at the present time. It will add much to the development of that country that this park be placed in the position where the Secretary of the Interior may, between now and the 1st of July, 1917, take charge of it and make arrangements for its proper care and protection and improvement, so that next year it may be in good shape for general improvement and use.

The committee a year and a half ago were in the same condition on this bill with reference to——

Mr. MANN. What is the name of that park?

Mr. RAKER. Lassen Volcanic National Park. Two years ago, when the sundry civil bill had passed, the Rocky Mountain National Park bill authorized an expenditure of $10,000 and no more. In the deficiency bill, which was presented to the House later, it was provided for, so that the park might be properly taken care of.

Mr. MANN. This is the Lassen Volcanic National Park?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I am looking into the Index. It will not appear under "Volcanic" or "Lassen" or "Park." My observation is that if you want to look into an Index for anything you want to look into the statutes, because unless you have a vivid imagination you would not find it.

Mr. RAKER. I looked, but I could not find it until I looked under "California."

Mr. MANN. I make these remarks for the benefit of the Index clerk. I have quit looking at the Index for anything. Has there been an estimate for this?

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir; it has been sent in.

Mr. MANN. Does that provide for any other park?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. I had in mind the Hawaiian Park, just created.

Mr. RAKER. That did not need it. They have just established it, and they have provided for this—the Hawaiian people have.

Mr. MANN. That is not correct.

Mr. RAKER. It was my understanding in the presentation to the Committee on Public Lands, when the matter was reported out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. We put in a specific limitation in the Hawaiian Park bill. I wondered why they had sent an estimate for one and not for the other.

Mr. RAKER. I did not look that one up. I trust the committee will see its way clear to allow this to go on the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It would be very unfortunate for the State of California if it should be adopted. There are 68,000 acres of land covered with timber in this park, and we are now approaching the time when the danger from forest fires is very acute.

This tract of land is now in the control of the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture. It is patrolled by its rangers, and there is available for the suppression of forest fires and the proper care of the park a general appropriation in the Agricultural act in case fire should develop. If this amendment should be adopted it takes the control away from the Forest Service and puts it in the Department of the Interior, and all that will be done out of this money will be to provide for a supervisor of the park or a superintendent of the park and one ranger to cover an area consisting of 68,000 acres.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Have we not already taken it out of the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The statement before the committee is to the effect that until the appropriation is made for the park under the care of the Department of the Interior the Forest Service will continue in control and in charge.

Mr. MANN. We have created a national park by act of Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but it has not been turned over to them yet.

Mr. MANN. I do not see what they have to do with turning it over. We turn it over.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are in there ex necessitate rei. How is that? That ought to be conclusive. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not hear that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was a little Latin quotation that ought to be conclusive in this park

Mr. MANN. It would be if it were correct, but it is not correct. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five thousand dollars would simply provide a position for the superintendent and one ranger. Now, it is absurd to think of having 68,000 acres of public land, timbered, situated near the only active volcano in the United States, and in danger not only of having fires from the usual and ordinary conditions that create such fires, but being in danger also of a great conflagration as the result of the untimely eruption of Mount Lassen, placed solely in the charge of one superintendent and ranger. In the interest of this public land and the timber on it, and the people of California who live in adjacent territory, I must protest in the name of all of the people of California against any attempt to put them at the mercy of devastating fires by the adoption of such an amendment as this.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I appreciate the fact that the attention of the gentleman from California was not called to the disastrous results that would follow the adoption of this amendment. I regret I had not the opportunity to consult with him before it was proposed. I am quite certain that he will not desire to proceed under those circumstances, and if he insists on pressing it I will appeal to the committee to protect the people of his State from the foolhardiness of the adoption of such an amendment. Can the gentleman resist such an appeal? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman evidently is not familiar with the territory or the conditions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have ridden by it.

Mr. RAKER. That is 60 miles from it, on the train, on the Pullman, with everything convenient. I desire to speak of the sentiment of the people of northern California and the district I have the honor to represent as to the creation of this park. They have been in favor of it, and practically unanimous. The Department of the Interior went over the matter as to the assistants that would be needed for the present year and possibly the next year, in regard to superintendent and assistants to take care of it. I believe that the provisions of the bill and the amount of the appropriation are sufficient for the first year. The gentleman must further remember that there are large stretches of this territory upon which there is no timber. It is volcanic rock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, there is no timber around the rim of the volcano.

Mr. RAKER. Of course, the gentleman's statement, while he intends to come within the actual conditions, does not apply to this case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not?

Mr. RAKER. Because the fact does not exist.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is timber on this 68,000 acres.

Mr. RAKER. There is timber on parts of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And there is danger of forest fires.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman from New York understand that his insistence upon the point of order will probably close the door of opportunity out in that country to some deserving Democrats?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not insisting on any point of order, because the item is in order. I am making an argument to appeal to the intelligence of Members of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment opens the door of opportunity for a number of deserving Democrats out in the State of California.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no use in wasting it at Mount Lassen.

Mr. MANN. How could the gentleman from Wyoming expect the gentleman from Brooklyn to be interested in deserving Democrats out in California?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Any more than in Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAKER) there were—ayes 8, noes 14.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER: Page 37, at the end of line 7, insert:

"NATIONAL PARKS.

"National Park Service: Director of National Park Service, $4,500 per annum; assistant director, $2,500 per annum; chief clerk, $2,000 per annum; one draftsman, $1,800 per annum; one messenger, $600 per annum; and in addition thereto such experts, assistants, and other employees within the District of Columbia as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary, $6,750; in all, for park service in the District of Columbia, $16,250. So much of the sundry civil act of July 1, 1916, as authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to employ in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1917 a superintendent of national parks and to assist him such clerical or other services, not exceeding four persons and make payment for such services from the several appropriations for protection, improvement, and management of the various national parks including Hot Springs Reservation, and out of the revenues from rentals and privileges derived therefrom, is hereby repealed."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, as to this item the Committee on Appropriations did not have the estimate when they made their report. The Secretary of the Interior sends the following letter to the Secretary of the Treasury:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, August 26, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I transmit herewith an estimate in the sum of $16,250 for the administration in the District of Columbia of the National Park Service created by the act of Congress approved August 25, 1916, and have to request that it be forwarded to Congress for its early and favorable consideration.

It was not practicable to include this estimate in the annual estimates of this department submitted in December of 1915, as the bill creating the National Park Service was then under consideration in Congress. The appropriation covered by this estimate is necessary to enable the department to provide for the proper administration of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia during that portion of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, commencing September 1, 1916.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

And the same was then transmitted, on August 26, by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, to the Congress. I have been in consultation with the Secretary of the Interior and want to call the attention of the committee—they are all familiar with it—to the fact that unless provision is made by this appropriation the benefits of the park-service bill will not be available. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee further to the fact that in the hearing before the committee the bill had not yet then been signed, and of course the committee wisely felt that they could not include this item in their bill. They repealed the provisions that furnish help for the park service now, and this carries about $2,000 less than provided by the bill creating the park. Instead of being $8,400 in the District of Columbia, it is only $6,750. It is, in effect, no extra expense to the Government, but is a concentration under this park-service bill, so that the work can be done in better shape and in better condition than it has been done in the past.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that the Committee on Appropriations did not have the estimate as to this item when they made their report?

Mr. RAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. What is the date of the estimate?

Mr. RAKER. August 26.

Mr. MANN. This deficiency bill was not reported until August 29. Why were they not on the job in the Interior Department?

Mr. RAKER. They were on the job, and before the committee.

Mr. MANN. Did they call it to the attention of the committee?

Mr. RAKER. They did.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They called it to the attention of the committee, but at that time there was no law creating the park service.

Mr. MANN. Is there anything in the hearings about it?

Mr. RAKER. On page 281 of the hearings, Mr. Albright, assistant attorney for the Department of the Interior, who was before the committee, called their attention to the bill; but at that time the bill had not been signed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, I know; but the bill was signed four days before this deficiency bill was reported to the House. Does it take four days for a thing to get through their heads down there?

Mr. RAKER. The estimates were prepared four or five days before the bill was signed, but could not be acted upon by the department until the bill was signed.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman himself go before the committee after the bill was signed?

Mr. RAKER. No; I went before the committee before the bill was signed.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask another question. You propose an appropriation here, I suppose, for the officials named in the park bill?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And then for the clerks authorized by it. There is a limit——

Mr. RAKER. Eight thousand five hundred dollars in the law.

Mr. MANN. Now you propose to repeal, not the appropriation in the sundry civil bill, but the authority to use the money.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, all that money will be used for something else.

Mr. RAKER. I think not. It is not authorized.

Mr. MANN. What makes the gentleman think it will not be?

Mr. RAKER. It takes that much from the appropriation.

Mr. MANN. How does the amendment take anything from the appropriation?

Mr. RAKER. I will read:

So much of the sundry civil act of July 1, 1916, as authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to employ in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1917 a superintendent of national parks and to assist him such clerical or other services not exceeding four persons, and make payment for such services from the several appropriations for protection, improvement, and management of the various national parks, including Hot Springs Reservation, and out of the revenues from rentals and privileges derived therefrom, is hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the appropriation in the sundry civil act remains as it is. There is no cutting off of the appropriation. The intention is to spend it. All you do is to make an additional appropriation, so that the authorization to spend out of the sundry civil appropriation to pay these employees is repealed, but you spend the appropriation for something else.

Mr. RAKER. It says, "and make payment for such services from the several appropriations," and so forth.

Mr. MANN. That is the authorization. Here is the fund, a certain amount of money, with authority to spend out of that sum of money and make payment to certain employees. You propose to repeal the authority, but not to reduce the appropriation. You propose to make another appropriation.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the intention.

Mr. MANN. That is what you do.

Mr. RAKER. We could re-form the amendment to cover it. I did not understand that it did that thing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will admit that it does not repeal the appropriation; that it does not cut down any appropriation.

Mr. RAKER. It repeals the authorization to pay the men to do the work—the employment of the men and the payment. I imagine that they could not use the money for anything else.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; the appropriation is made for a general purpose. Out of the appropriation they are authorized to spend a certain amount of money to pay certain employees. You propose to appropriate specifically for the employees and leave the appropriation what it is now. It may be that they need the money. I have no doubt they think they need it.

Mr. RAKER. It is not intended to authorize any more money, or permit any more money for this service to be used than has actually been made. It will not be an increase in expenses to the Government but a consolidation carrying out the will of Congress in the National Park Service bill in which it may be organized and brought under one head.

Mr. MANN. Is not the authorization already repealed by the park act, where we provide by special act for the creation of a National Park Service? Does not that repeal the provision in the sundry civil act contemplating the same thing in another way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it does not.

Mr. MANN. I think it does, because unless it does you have two park service authorizations, the laws of which are in conflict. This special park act turns over the parks to the National Park Service created by the special act, what we will hereafter call, I suppose, the organic act. That repeals any provision for somebody else to do the same thing.

Mr. RAKER. Here comes the question—we have a National Park Service in existence and there is no provision for them to do the work. It would not be right to leave that condition to stand until next July.

Mr. MANN. I am not saying that it would. I think we ought to provide for the National Park Service, but I think the department ought to come here so that we can have an understanding of it and not spring it as an amendment on the floor of the House.

Mr. RAKER. They did.

Mr. MANN. They did not.

Mr. RAKER. They came and presented it to the committee.

Mr. MANN. On August 26 they dictated a letter which was transmitted to the Speaker of the House on August 27. What day was it referred?

Mr. RAKER. On August 29.

Mr. MANN. I told you so. Anybody could guess it out. I got them a little speedier than they were. On August 26 they dictated a letter which was written the 27th, transmitted to Congress by mail late in the afternoon of August 28, reached the House August 29, and is referred to the committee. If they can not handle the park service better than that the young trees will die before they discover that they are there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the sundry civil act provides the necessary force for a National Park Service and a sufficient sum to enable it to do what work is necessary to be done between now and the next session. The bulk of the travel in the national parks ceases about the 1st of September, and most of them are closed because of climatic conditions. At the next session of Congress it will be possible to provide for the new service for the balance of the fiscal year and the next fiscal year, hence I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF.

For additional amount for the removal of the college women's dormotory, and the construction, equipment, and furnishing of a new dormitory, necessary repairs, or replacement of walks and grading of grounds adjacent to said dormitory, including all material, personal and other services, and for each and every purpose in connection therewith, to be expended under the direction of the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, $53,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 13, strike out the word "dormotory" and insert the word "dormitory," and in line 19, after the word "grounds," insert the words "fiscal year 1917."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland, from the appropriation entitled "Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1915," for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including March 4, 1915, during which period services were rendered by him in good faith as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri, is authorized notwithstanding the fact that his appointment was not confirmed by the United States Senate.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph, and I think I shall make it. Very likely Mr. Bland ought to be paid. In view of the conditions relating to various of these claims, it seems to me that this is an item for the Senate to propose. The Senate rejected the confirmation, as they have in a number of cases. There has been a hot contest over there as to whether when they reject a confirmation a man should be paid, the man having rendered the actual service. I am inclined to think they all ought to be treated upon the same footing. I think this is a matter for the Senate to dispose of. If the Senate desires to add it as an amendment, I have not the slightest objection to it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this item is an authorization merely for the payment out of the current appropriation of 1916 of the salary of Mr. Ewing C. Bland as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri. Mr. Bland is a son, as most of the Members know, of Richard P. Bland, for many years a Member of this House from the State of Missouri. Young Bland, who is a practicing lawyer in Kansas City, was appointed without any solicitation on his own part by the Attorney General as United States marshal at a time when there was some difficulty in securing the services of a suitable appointee. At that time the Republican incumbent of the office had died, and the United States judge was filling the place temporarily by the appointment of a deputy under the former marshal. He was filling it by appointment for each session of the court. It became necessary to fill the office, and Mr. Bland was asked to take it. At the time that he was asked to take it he was the judge of the municipal court of Kansas City, and had been recently reelected to that position. He accepted the appointment of United States marshal and resigned his judicial office. His appointment under the Constitution of the United States runs until the last day of the session of the Senate next following, it being a vacation appointment. Therefore his commission ran until the 4th of March, 1915, and he served until the 4th day of March, 1915, and no one else served during that period and no one else claimed to have served during that period. He was the only United States marshal and the only one authorized to serve process. In the meantime his appointment was rejected by the Senate, but the rejection by the Senate has no force by law or by the Constitution to recall the commission issued to him by the President of the United States. It has no force to render vacant the office that he has held. It has no force to remove him from office, and he would not be out of office prior to the expiration of his commission unless he resigned his appointment, and in that case some one else would have to be temporarily appointed. As a matter of fact, the rejection of the Senate has no legal force whatever. The Constitution says that the Senate may concur. That is, it must give its advice and consent, but it does not provide for any such action as rejection by the Senate, and the failure of the Senate to concur, either with or without reason, is a rejection without affirmative action. After Mr. Bland's term of office had expired on March 4, 1915, some little time afterwards—a week or two, as I recollect it—another gentleman was appointed by a vacation appointment, and he has since been confirmed and paid.

The law provides that a man can not be paid for serving as United States marshal unless he is confirmed by the Senate.

That law, as we all know, is one of the few fragmentary relics of the old struggle between the Senate of the United States and President Andrew Johnson over the rejection of certain officeholders in the South. That law has been repealed in nearly all of its particulars. It applied originally to every Federal office in the United States, but as to the Post Office Department and other positions in the Government it has been expressly repealed by Congress, and now anyone serving by authority of the President of the United States is entitled to his pay for the time actually served. Why it has not been repealed in the case of United States marshals I do not know, but it ought to be repealed. I do know this, that it has been universally customary when a man serves by vacation appointment, and no one else is claiming to have served for the same period, that he shall be paid for services rendered in good faith under commission and authority of the President of the United States. To do less than that is to deprive the President of the United States of the constitutional power which he has to see to it that the laws of the Union are faithfully executed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The highest constitutional power vesting in the President of the United States, one which is absolutely vital to the existence of the Government, is the power to see to it that the laws of the Union are faithfully executed, and to do that he must have subordinate officers serving under his authority. If it lies in the power of the advisory body to vacate an office and keep it vacant, then that highest power of the President is destroyed. That was the decision arrived at by the Attorney General of the United States as far back as when William Wirt was Attorney General. He decided that the President had the power to fill appointments in the vacancy of the Senate, and that the words "occurring in the vacancy of the Senate" meant "happening to exist" in the vacancy of the Senate—that is, continuing to exist during the vacancy of the Senate, whether it happened at a time when the Senate was in session or not.

As to the question that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] raised—and I hope he will not press the point, and I want to direct this request especially to him—I have this to say. It is customary and in fact proper that the estimates for these appropriations shall come to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives. I do not see any reason in this case why the gentleman should suggest that we surrender that particular responsibility and prerogative any more than we ought to do so on other appropriations. These estimates do go to the Committee on Appropriations of the House. They properly go there, and they ought to be there considered. I take it that the Senate could very well say if we failed to include them that we did not desire to have them included. It is not necessary that they should be added in the Senate, nor should we allow a custom to grow up of certain amendments being added in the Senate.

In other words, there is nothing in this particular appropriation which would cause it to constitute any exception at all to the usual class of appropriations which have been sent to the Committee on Appropriations of the House and included in a regular appropriation bill, and that does not deprive the Senate of its power to act upon it as fully and freely as if it were acting in its own committee originally. So that I trust the gentleman will not press his point.

Mr. MANN. This item was put in a former bill?

Mr. BORLAND. It was.

Mr. MANN. And stricken out by the Senate?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; stricken out by the Senate, but I apprehend that has happened very frequently about items.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman anticipate any objection to this item in another body?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. The matter has been arranged, has it?

Mr. BORLAND. No; it absolutely has not been arranged, but I do not anticipate there will be any trouble.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we are so very near the close of the session I do not think we should do anything, unless it is very clearly and definitely our duty to do it, if it is likely to prolong the session and prevent an agreement in conference.

Mr. BORLAND. I am quite confident this will not prolong the session considering other crises and contingencies that are occurring.

Mr. MONDELL. We should not promote any dissension in the ranks of the faithful at this late hour of the session.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think it will. I trust not. The justness of paying this man a salary is so manifest that I think the Senate will agree to it, and we must assume that the Senate acted without sufficient information on the subject. So I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order and let it go in the bill and let the Senate act on it fully and freely as they see fit.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. We put this item in a former bill. I do not remember what took place in the Senate. My recollection is in the final end we agreed to the Senate amendment striking out the item. That was in conference, I suppose. There is quite a controversy going on in the Senate as to what should be done in reference to appointments made in recess that are not confirmed by the Senate. The Constitution of the United States, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], provides that the commission shall expire with the end of the next session of the Senate. Even so distinguished a body as the Senate did not know that was the provision of the Constitution when they had this item before them the last time. We might judge by the fact they passed the Federal farm-loan credit bill with a provision in it that if the recess appointments should be made under that law the commission should expire 30 days after the beginning of the next session, and that bill in that shape was reported to the House by one of the ablest committees of this House. It never was changed until I called attention to it, because I happened to recollect that was a provision of the Senate. The Senate has also, I believe, in one bill put in a specific provision that there should not be paid out of the District of Columbia appropriations to one officer who had a recess appointment and who was afterwards rejected by the Senate. He served just as Mr. Bland served. Then there is another case. The Federal Trade Commission provided for the appointment of certain commissioners to be divided between the two parties. The President named five Democrats, contrary to the law, and called two of them Progressive Republicans. One of those Progressive Republicans came from the State where the Republican leader of the Senate comes from. His only activity in politics I have ever heard of was conducting a campaign for the Democratic candidate against the Republican leader of the Senate for reelection. I think it is fair to assume he is not a Republican, and that the President, in plain violation of both the letter and the spirit of the Federal Trade Commission act, refused to appoint a Republican to that place, and we are told he intends to keep him in the place. He has been rejected. We are told that he is going to get a recess appointment, and under the system we have if he gets a recess appointment when Congress adjourns that will again run as the present recess appointment has run until the expiration of the next session of Congress, as the present appointment will run until the expiration of this session of Congress. So that under that construction the theoretical power of the Senate to reject a nomination is only theoretical and it is not practical, and the only power which the Senate has under this construction of the Constitution is to refuse to pay the person holding the commission.

I am not willing to take that power away from them when the President, not merely this President but other Presidents, has plainly disregarded the spirit of the law and renominated time after time as a recess appointment the same man whom the Senate has refused to confirm and kept him in office, as may be done in the particular case to which I have referred as long as the President desires to do so. Now, we can not change the Constitution in that respect but we do not have to pay the man. I am willing to pay Mr. Bland, as far as I am concerned. I am very sorry that he happens to be ground between the upper and nether millstone, but let the Senate determine what they will do with reference to these matters, as they are peculiarly within the province of the Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Bland was appointed by a vacation appointment and my recollection is there were two other gentlemen appointed at the same time, one in New York and I think one in South Dakota. They failed of confirmation. They were not reappointed. No vacation appointment was given them after the expiration of the term of the Senate so as to continue them in office. In fact, the very contrary occurred. The appointments went to other parties, so that there is nothing to connect this case with the case of the commissioner to whom the gentleman has referred that occurred more than a year afterwards.

This man was not given a reappointment, but the result of his having accepted the President's commission was to compel him to resign an office to which the people of Kansas City had elected him and which, of course, was afterwards filled by another man, leaving him entirely out of both offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, Gen. Smith was nominated as one of the Excise Commissioners of the District of Columbia. He was rejected by the Senate. I do not know him and never saw him in my life. I am not sure, but it seems to me that the Senate put in an amendment specifically providing that he should not be paid his salary because he had been rejected by the Senate. Whether that was——

Mr. BORLAND. Whether that was wise or not I suppose they had the power to do so. It may have been wise and it may have been unwise. But the Senate has the power to protect itself even in this case.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I am not willing to let the Senate act as a matter of favoritism merely. Let them determine what their policy is going to be.

Mr. BORLAND. Why should we try to determine it here?

Mr. MANN. This is now in the District of Columbia bill that has gone to the President to-day:

Provided, That the term of office of any member of the Excise Board whose nomination has been or may be rejected by the Senate shall be terminated by such rejection—

That is unconstitutional—

and no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the salary of any member of the board whose nomination has been rejected by the Senate.

The first part of that is unconstitutional, but the second part is not. Now, I am not willing that the Senate shall play a matter of favoritism as to whether some particular Senator wants a man paid and another wants a man not to be paid. I believe we ought to treat them all on the same basis. If these men hold their offices legally—and I believe they do—we should pay them their salaries and not permit the Senate, because it does not happen to like a man, to say, after his duty has been performed, he shall not be paid for it.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not understand the gentleman to mean that Bland should not be paid unless these other people are paid?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. BORLAND. The question comes down as to whether Bland is entitled to his money.

Mr. MANN. The House has just agreed to an amendment stating that one man whose nomination had been rejected should not be paid. Now, the gentleman proposes on the same day that that bill has been signed by the Speaker of the House to put a provision in there that another man under exactly similar circumstances must be paid. I do not think that is fair.

Mr. BORLAND. There is a great deal of difference between agreeing to an amendment that comes from the Senate and conceding the appointment of a man who was not commissioned and appointed to his office.

Mr. MANN. I think the Senate ought to pass on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 39, after line 19, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"There is created a commission, to be composed of the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Navy, the superintendent of prisons of the Department of Justice, and the purchasing agent of the Post Office Department, who shall serve without additional compensation, and who shall report to Congress, not later than the first Monday in December, 1916, detailed estimates and plans for equipping the United States penitentiaries for the manufacture, by the prisoners, of various articles used by the Government. Such report shall indicate what articles it is thought desirable to be so manufactured, the cost of equipping existing buildings and the erection and equipping of any other necessary buildings, the probable cost of manufacture of such articles and the price now paid under contract, and such other data as may be pertinent to the general inquiry. For expenses of the commission to be paid on vouchers to be approved by the chairman, who shall be selected by the members thereof, $5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nineteen hundred and sixteen, $56,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 42, after line 6, insert the following: "Nineteen hundred and fourteen, $800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

Contingent expenses: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the department, including the same objects specified under this head in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1916, to continue available during the fiscal year 1917, $2,310.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 43, line 7, strike out the figures "1917" and insert the words "nineteen hundred and seventeen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved May 10, 1916, as amended by the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1917, shall not prohibit the employment and payment, since May 9, 1916, in the Immigration Service at Ellis Island, of A. B. Fry, a consulting engineer employed in another branch of the Federal service, under such terms as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, and ask my colleague for a brief explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Fry is employed in the Treasury Department at a compensation of $2,900 a year. During the last 16 or 17 years he has been employed by the Department of Labor and the Department of Commerce and Labor, and as consulting engineer has had charge of the construction on Ellis Island, and as superintendent is paid $1,500 a year.

He is now in charge of the work in connection with the repairs resulting from the Black Tom explosion. The Department of Labor state that his services are more valuable if continued under the old arrangement than they would be if they employed another man at a much larger expense. This is under a provision that prohibits two salaries when in excess of $2,000 a year, and applies to Mr. Fry. He has been a great many years in the Federal service, and at one time, if my recollection is accurate, he was the head of the fire department. He is now in command of the Naval Militia, and is recognized as an engineer of very high attainments.

Mr. BENNET. This does not permit him to draw any more than the usual four salaries that he has been accustomed to drawing, does it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It permits him to do as he has done heretofore—to draw two salaries.

Mr. BENNET. For a good many years he has been drawing four?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has drawn two, as I understand.

Mr. BENNET. My colleague overlooks the salary that he draws from the State of New York and the one that he draws from the Treasury Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not familiar with the salary that he draws from the State of New York, except as to whatever compensation he may receive as commander of the Naval Militia.

Mr. BENNET. I want to make sure that this does not increase the number of salaries he has been drawing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the compensation he has been receiving for 10 years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman tell the committee how many salaries he receives from the United States and from the State and from the Naval Militia?

Mr. BENNET. He is a very able man, and his services are appreciated, but I have no possible way of knowing what his total income is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman tell us how much time he devotes to his Federal duties?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, he has charge of three post offices in Manhattan and the appraisers' stores, and——

Mr. MANN. Has charge of them? What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has charge of them in the sense that he has charge of any construction or repair work that may be needed with respect to them.

Mr. MANN. He gets paid if he does anything?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. He is an employee of the Treasury Department, is he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. For how much?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Two thousand nine hundred dollars.

Mr. MANN. How much of his time does he give to that work?

Mr. FITZGERALD My understanding is that he gives all of his time to the Federal service.

Mr. MANN. Well, if he gives all of his time to that, how can he do this other work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What other work?

Mr. MANN. All the work provided here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I say he gives all his time to the Federal service, which includes the various departments.

Mr. MANN. He must be a wonderful man.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think he is. I have seen him.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that in New York they have nobody else but this one man who is competent to do this work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think this man receives less than would otherwise be paid for the work that is done by him. This man has designed and has had charge of the construction of the Ellis Island plants.

Mr. MANN. How much has he been paid for that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One thousand five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. MANN. No more than that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No more than that. He was the engineer and superintendent of construction. He has had charge of that work for about 17 years, and there are large expenditures there every year for dredging and improvements of various kinds.

Mr. MANN. He gets now from the Federal Government $4,400 a year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; $1,500 from the Department of Labor and $2,900 from the Treasury Department.

Mr. MANN. What does he get from New York City?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what he gets from the city of New York, unless he gets something from the State as commander of the Naval Militia.

Mr. MANN. Does he get a boat from the State to operate with?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He gets a boat from the Federal Government.

Mr. MANN. The Government furnishes a boat, and he operates that as headquarters of the militia?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The militia has an armory, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Has the committee found any other case where the act prohibiting the payment of two salaries that would aggregate more than $2,000 would apply?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He found that himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My acquaintance with Mr. Fry comes from his appearance before the Committee on Appropriations. I do not think I have met him more than once or twice outside of that. I know that he has a very excellent reputation as an engineer of high standing. He has for about 17 years been receiving $4,400 a year from the Federal Government for his services. When this provision was put in the legislative act his compensation was reduced by $1,500. The Department of Labor officials insist that paying him $1,500 a year obtains for them services of a value much in excess of the sum paid. I have no doubt that that is true. The Ellis Island plant is a very extensive one, and he has had charge of and superintended it. He prepares the plans for repairs there, and I guess he earns all he gets. Four thousand four hundred a year is not a princely income in the city of New York for a competent engineer. Why, they pay office boys that much over there. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. How about the case in the city of Brooklyn? This is in Brooklyn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, we do pretty well ourselves at times. It is the Borough of Brooklyn, however, I will say to the gentleman. The "city of Brooklyn" no longer exists.

Mr. MANN. We say "the city of Brooklyn." You can not change a place by a vote over there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You can not change our loyalty by a change of name or title.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Is it not a matter of fact that Mr. Fry would get 5 per cent upon each dollar's worth of work done if he received the usual commission as an architect in New York?

Mr. MANN. That would depend upon what he did. He would not if he does only what he does now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If he were a member of the architects' union, he would get 6 per cent and would not work.

Mr. SIEGEL. Then on this job at Ellis Island he would get at least $9,000?

Mr. MANN. That would depend on what he did. An architect does not get 5 per cent for merely looking at things. He must have an office. The Treasury Department does the work that the architect usually gets paid for.

Mr. GLASS. I have known architects to be paid 6 per cent for work which they did not do, which they had been employed to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I ask that we move on, and that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment being withdrawn, the Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. There was a point of order made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BENNET. My colleague has withdrawn the point of order for me. I withdraw it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of the net amount, namely, $689,460.54, of a judgment of the Court of Claims, dated December 6, 1915, certified to Congress in House Document No. 1332, of this session, rendered under the act of February 15, 1909, in favor of the Mille Lac Band of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, to be credited to "Chippewas in Minnesota fund," established by section 7 of the act approved January 14, 1889; $487,873.94 of said net judgment, as determined by the Court of Claims, to bear interest which is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from December 6, 1915, until the date the fund is credited; and thereafter the amount credited to the fund shall draw interest as provided in section 7 of the said act of January 14, 1889.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is in accordance with law.

Mr. MANN. The last clause is probably subject to a point of order. However, I reserved the point of order for the purpose of making a statement. This is an appropriation of almost $700,000. It will amount to more than $700,000, including the interest, to pay a judgment recovered by the Mille Lac Tribe of Indians. We have a good many of these claims pending—quite a number of bills which have been reported to refer Indian tribe claims to the Court of Claims. This case is a very fair illustration of what happens. The Court of Claims rendered this judgment. It may be that the judgment is properly rendered. I do not raise any question about that, but this judgment of $700,000 is to pay the Indians for about 31,000 acres of land which we gave away. Now, it is going some when you buy 31,000 acres of land for about $700,000 in order to give it to settlers. That is what was done in this case in the main. Of the 31,000 acres of land the State of Minnesota received 3,022 acres and a fraction as school lands. There were homestead and preemption entries entered and patented amounting to 28,246 acres and a fraction. Practically the entire 31,000 acres of land were given away and the Government received nothing whatever, or, maybe, $1.25 an acre for a small part of the land. It had valuable timber upon it. Having given it away, we provided for sending to the Court of Claims the claim which would find out what it was worth, and to pay the worth to the Indians. Of course, I suppose that at the time it happened no one here thought of taking 31,000 acres of land up in Minnesota and finding that it was worth three-quarters of a million dollars. Probably the Members of Congress who passed the bill supposed that it involved finding the value of 31,000 acres of land at a price of $1, $2, or $2.50 an acre. Now, having done it all, we reach the point where we have to pay the judgment. We neither have the land nor the money. The Indians have lost the land, which never was worth anything to them, but was probably worth a good deal to the settlers who grabbed it. This generation are called upon to pay for it, though the generation which obtained the land and probably spent the money are mostly dead. This is a fitting illustration of the character of most of these bills provided for reference of Indian claims to the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I meant to look up, but did not, the provision in the last clause that the amount credited to the fund shall draw interest, as provided in section 7 of the act of June 14, 1889. These old acts usually provided a higher rate of interest than we provide now for Indian funds. There is no reason on earth why, having made a present to the Indians of nearly three-quarters of a million dollars, which, in my judgment, they never were entitled to, we should now pay them a very much higher rate of interest than we pay upon current items.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law provides it.

Mr. MANN. If the law provides it, it does not need to be in the bill, and I will make the point of order. I do not think the law does provide it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I looked it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law provides for interest.

Mr. MANN. Then what is the object of carrying it in this bill? I think the law does not provide anything about this fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I read it that way.

Mr. MANN. Then it does not need to be in here. That is clear, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does not change the law.

Mr. MANN. I think it was put in here to change the law. But does the gentleman know the rate of interest provided in the act of 1889?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will send for the statute.

Mr. MANN. Let this be passed over for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the paragraph in question will be passed over temporarily and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

None of the judgments contained in this act shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The language here is:

None of the judgments contained in this act shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired.

It does not seem to me that that is the ordinary language. Has it not been customary, where the right of appeal is waived, or where the Government states that it is not its intention to take an appeal, to pay the judgment? I think in this Indian case that I was just talking about the right of appeal does not expire for some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision is always carried.

Mr. MANN. My recollection was—it may be erroneous—that we usually provide that the right of appeal shall first expire, or that the attorney for the department shall certify that no appeal is to be taken. Most of these judgments probably have the right of appeal still in existence for some time, but if the Government determines that it is not going to take an appeal, then there is no reason for deferring the payment of the judgment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the provision that has been carried in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction and repair of hospitals, $3,660.19.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was out of the Chamber temporarily when the clerk read an item that I want to ask the chairman of the committee about. On page 47, at the top of the page, I notice that there is an item—

To pay Samuel Robinson, William Madden, and Joseph De Fontes, messengers on night duty during the present session of Congress, for extra services, $700 each; in all, $2,100.

I will ask the chairman of the committee if there are not four of these messengers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. HARRISON. My understanding is that there are four of them, that another man by the name of Charlie Allen performs the same kind of service that is performed by these other three. He has been engaged in this service during the entire session, and it occurs to me that he ought to be entitled to the same amount as the others.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We think we ought not to enlarge this practice. The House has no control over the number of these messengers. They are employees of the Government Printing Office, which may put on any number of men. These three messengers have been getting this amount in this bill for many years, and it is practically a part of their salary. We are not going to extend the number of persons to whom these bonuses are given. We abolished that practice in this House some time ago.

Mr. HARRISON. I am asking for information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some one stated that there was another man assigned to the work, but no member of the committee had ever seen or heard of him and knows nothing about it.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not some one before the committee state that he had been on during the entire term, or was not there a memorandum handed to the committee to that effect?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think there was a statement that he began work in December. He is getting $1,400 a year and 20 per cent additional for night work, and we think that is enough.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman think that he ought to discriminate against the fourth man?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman ever read the parable of the vineyard?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but I would like to have it quoted by the gentleman. I will say that the reason why I am interested is that this man is from South Carolina, and inasmuch as the primaries were on in that State there was no one here to look out for him, and he spoke to me about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think South Carolina has been pretty well taken care of in this administration.

Mr. HARRISON. But this gentleman is interested for himself and not for South Carolina. I think he ought to be taken care of like the others.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a matter of opinion. The gentleman can not find anybody else in the House that entertains the same view, and so there is not much hope for him.

The Clerk read as follows:

For suppressing liquor traffic among the Indians, 50 cents.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it is a distinct comfort to run across an item now and then that you can truthfully say does not appear to be wasteful. This item "for suppressing the liquor traffic among the Indians, 50 cents," impresses me as being one instance where the funds are not being excessively squandered. [Laughter.]

In this brief afternoon we have run across two instances which on the face of them look equally innocuous. One apparently reduced a salary from $250 to $200, and it turned out that instead of reducing it it was an increase of the man's salary by something like $217.60 per annum. Then, by judicious questioning of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, we found out that one of our distinguished fellow citizens from New York was enjoying the privilege of drawing four salaries from different public treasuries. So, although the item on the face of it looks as if it was not extravagant, it is very possible that there is an explanation that this innocent item "for suppressing the liquor traffic among the Indians, 50 cents," may in some way veil some deep, mysterious, and extravagant appropriation, but I hope not. [Laughter.] The object seems to be a worthy one, and the fact that this money is all to be spent in one year and not distributed over a term of years seems to indicate that they are expected to complete the job within the amount of the appropriation. [Laughter.]

I note also that there is no authorization for additional expenditure over and above the 50 cents. I do not know much about Indians. I represent white men almost exclusively in my district. I beg to assure my colleague, however, and the Members of the House that it takes a good deal more money than that to suppress the liquor traffic among white people. I have heard that the Indian in his native heath is more or less addicted to liquor. It may not be so. You can not always rely on what you read in the papers.

I read at one time in my youth a story of a miner on the western plains who told about his encounter with an Indian. As he was riding across he met an Indian. The miner had a quart of whisky in his possession. The Indian had a valuable rifle, a valuable pony, and valuable saddle blankets; he had clothing, and before he got through he offered that white man for that one single quart of whisky all of these valuable things. He offered to strip down to his breechcloth and give him his clothes. A white man heard the story of the miner and then asked, "What happened when you let him have the whisky?" "Oh," said the miner, "I did not let him have the whisky; that was my last quart of whisky." [Laughter.]

I do not think that liquor among the Indians could be suppressed for 50 cents, to say nothing of the white man. I do not know whether my colleague has any explanation. If he has, we would like to hear it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. It might be that that which is concealed in the paragraph relates to the Tammany Indians. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENNET. No Tammany Indian of my acquaintance needs to be suppressed. In my district, at least, they are good Indians.

Mr. MONDELL. May not this be the real Democratic economy for which we have been waiting so long?

Mr. BENNET. If the gentleman from Wyoming had been present when I began my speech he would know that I indulged in a small hope of that kind, but I am waiting for the explanation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman had examined the bill closely he would not have asked this question. The trouble is the gentlemen do not utilize the powers of observation with which they have been endowed. You must take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances, as any good lawyer, like the gentleman from New York, would do. All of these items are headed "Claims allowed by the Auditor of the Interior Department." I can not take the time to hunt up the law for the gentleman under which the auditors of the various departments operate. It so happens in this instance the claim was presented, which was a legal claim entitled to be paid, chargeable against the appropriation for the fiscal year 1912. For some reason not disclosed, it not appearing on the face of the record, unknown to me or anybody else on the committee, the claim was not presented in time. Under the operation of the covering-in act, two years after the expiration of the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made, the unexpended balance was covered into the Treasury. So the auditor, having carefully examined it, audited and certified this claim, and it is transmitted to Congress to be carried under this head in this bill. Of course, it may appear insignificant, it may appear trifling, it may appear beneath the dignity of Congress to deal with these trifling matters; but, after all, Mr. Chairman, the great mass of the people of the United States are accustomed to handling money in what we probably, in our larger vision and greater exercise of power, would consider trifling sums. The person to whom this 50 cents is due considers it the most important item in this bill. I have noticed that the interest of persons in appropriations is intensified by their relationship to the item, and this is to pay, under the law, a claim regularly certified, audited, and allowed, and under this administration, no matter how great or how small, no matter how high or how humble, all creditors of the United States receive the same treatment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 39 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to page 39 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 39, after line 5, by inserting:

"The payment of the salary of Ewing C. Bland, from the appropriation entitled 'Salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, 1915,' for the period from December 12, 1914, to and including March 4, 1915, during which period services were rendered by him in good faith as United States marshal for the western district of Missouri, is authorized, notwithstanding the fact that his appointment was not confirmed by the United States Senate."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course this item is subject to the point of order. I made the point of order when the item was reached in the bill. I made up my mind when I read the bill to make the point of order. I have not made the point of order upon the amendment as now offered. Perhaps it is unfair to the man himself that he should suffer, though frequently people do have to suffer because of the sins of omission of other people. I do not think that the Senate of the United States should be permitted to play battledore and shuttlecock with cases of this kind, and while I did make the point of order I have not done so now. I do not know that I have any way of apologizing to myself, to satisfy myself hereafter, however.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. No, I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 44 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 44, line 20, after the word "rent," by inserting the words "in the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that, on page 48, the paragraph encompassed in lines 4 to 21 was passed over temporarily.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the judgment of the Court of Claims provided that the amount of this judgment should be paid into the permanent fund created by section 7 of the act of January 14, 1889. Section 7 of that act provides that all money accruing from the disposal of lands, and so forth, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States—to the credit of all Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota as a permanent fund, and shall draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

Mr. MANN. This paragraph appropriates the amount of the judgment. What is to be done with it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To be placed in this fund.

Mr. MANN. It does not say so, does it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is for the payment of the amount, "to be credited to the 'Chippewas in Minnesota fund' established by section 7 of the act approved January 14, 1889," as the gentleman will see if he refers to lines 10, 11, 12, and 13.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law unquestionably requires this to be done.

Mr. MANN. Of course, we ought not to pay 5 per cent interest.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is true; and it is only the fact that the court decided that this money should go into this fund, which the law provides shall draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent, that the committee did this. There have been other instances where these Indian judgments have been obtained and a request has been made that they draw interest at certain rates, and the committee has uniformly recommended a reduction in the rate of interest heretofore made; but this is going into a fund already established, in which the rate of interest has already been fixed by law. It is a question whether we ought to change that.

Mr. MANN. Of course, the whole thing is—well, I shall not say a swindle on the Government, but very closely approaching it. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17645, the general deficiency appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15455. An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 6914. An act to amend section 82, chapter 231, of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 15774. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6227. An act to increase the area of the United States Botanic Garden in the city of Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the Library.

PROMOTION OF EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17350. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 359.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in the House H. R. 17350; that general debate shall continue on the bill not exceeding three hours the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]; that all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-seven gentlemen are present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEATING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that the House do now adjourn. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the motion is premature.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not make a motion until the announcement is made.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker be authorized to issue his warrant to the Sergeant at Arms to produce the absentees.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let us wait a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. That motion is premature, too. On this roll call 220 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The Clerk will report this resolution again.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina. The rule as reported says it shall be in order to consider in the House the bill in question. It does not say it shall be in order to consider in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The bill is on the Union Calendar. Is it the intention to consider this bill now in the House or in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union? I do not believe anybody can tell from reading the rule what the intention is.

Mr. POU. The purpose of the bill was to consider the bill in the House.

Mr. MANN. And not in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. POU. Yes; in the House.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course——

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. But that is not what the rule says.

Mr. GARRETT. I know; but that is the purpose of it.

Mr. MANN. If he does it, he may regret it.

Mr. GARRETT. Why?

Mr. MANN. Why, it is perfectly patent if you are going to consider a Union Calendar bill and can consider it in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union where there is a quorum consisting of 100 Members, you can make much more rapid progress than you can with a quorum consisting of 217 Members, with the privilege of anybody at any time raising the point of no quorum.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to amend the resolution so as to make it read that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. POU. That the bill be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman wants to move to strike out the language "in the House" in order to make it in order to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. What is it the gentleman from North Carolina desires?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in line 2 of the resolution the words "in the House" be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to strike out the words "in the House" in line 2. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words "in the House" in line 2 be stricken from the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by striking from the resolution, in line 2, the words "in the House."

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is it in order for the Rules Committee to bring in a resolution and amend it in this manner?

The SPEAKER. It is just like any other resolution except that it is privileged. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 153, noes 11.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 153, noes 11, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] demands tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were refused, three Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ninety-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those who are in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina to the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 206, nays 8, answered "present" 15, not voting 203, as follows:

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Speaker, I want to withdraw my vote "aye" and vote "present." I was paired.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is recognized.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if we can not agree upon a limit of time in which to discuss the rule. I would suggest 15 minutes on a side.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, I have applications for 20 minutes on this side. I think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. GARRETT. Is that in opposition?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not inquired of those who desire time, but I know a portion of it is in opposition.

The SPEAKER. What suggestion, if any, has the gentleman from North Carolina to make?

Mr. POU. I am willing to accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that 20 minutes' debate should be had on each side——

Mr. MANN. The previous question to be considered as ordered at the end of that time.

Mr. POU. Yes; the previous question to be considered as ordered at the end of that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on this rule be limited to 20 minutes on a side, he to have control of half the time, and the other side to control the other half, and at the end of 40 minutes the previous question to be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the importance of this bill is made manifest by statistics which are familiar to us all. The transportation of foreign commerce by the United States of America according to percentages started with 86½ per cent in 1830 and went down to 11⅛ per cent in 1915. This bill, H. R. 17350, is intended to stimulate our trade upon the ocean. I think it will accomplish the object intended. At any rate it is clear that something must be done to restore the flag of American commerce upon the high seas. At one time we carried upon American bottoms 86½. The decrease has gone steadily on until in 1915 we carried 11⅛ per cent. It seems to me nothing more needs to be said.

I do not care to discuss the rule myself, and therefore I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this rule should be adopted. It provides for an hour and a half of general debate on each side of the House, three hours total general debate on this bill.

Now, the bill is a very short one, comparatively speaking, so far as the actual number of sections in it or the words used in printing the bill are concerned, but in its far-reaching influence there has probably not been a more important bill brought before the House during all the nine long months we have been in session. I believe that the Nation, that the people of this country, are in more danger from hasty legislation than they are from too little legislation. So far as I am concerned, I shall not consent to the passing of a rule that cuts off general debate on this bill, the provisions of which will affect not only the 100,000,000 people here in the United States, but will reach out and touch the people of every nation on the globe. The party in power brings this bill forward as a means to encourage trade with foreign nations. The party in power wants to make a good showing on the eve of a campaign, aye, while we are in the midst of a national campaign. The intention of the administration in power brings this bill before Congress to make a favorable impression upon the business interests of this country. Apparently the object is to make big business feel there is no danger keeping the Democratic Party in power.

Do you know what this bill does? In the first place, it amends the Sherman antitrust law; it amends the Clayton antitrust law; it amends the Federal Trade Commission bill—those three great measures that have to do with the controlling of the great business interests of this country—laws enacted to prevent monopoly, to maintain competition, to destroy combinations in restraint of trade, to protect the people against so-called trusts. There was a time when we thought the Sherman antitrust law was almost sacred, and that if it were amended at all it should be amended so as to make it more strict upon the great business interests of this country. It was directed against trusts and combines and conspiracies. Yet here the Democratic Party comes in at the close of this session of Congress, at a time when we do not have the opportunity properly to consider it, to force this bill through Congress, and then, to make it even worse, it is proposed to pass a special resolution, adopting a rule limiting debate to only three hours upon this great bill that is to have a tremendous influence upon the condition of the people of the United States. I say I will not stand for it. I say I shall denounce it here and denounce it at every opportunity that I have.

Great problems are involved in this bill. I want to know how many of you Democrats on that side have given one hour to the study of this bill? How many of you have given serious and thorough consideration to what its effect will be upon this country? I hope the rule will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, we have no gentlemen on this side asking for time, so I will ask my friend from Wisconsin to use his time.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not particularly object to this rule. When there is before the House legislation which the majority consider important enough to require consideration, and it can not be considered under the ordinary rules of the House, it is entirely proper to bring in a rule for its consideration. It seems to me, however, that the rule might have given a little more time for the consideration of this very important measure. But the bringing in of this rule, and the further amendment of the Clayton antitrust law and other important laws which it is proposed to amend, bring to our attention the frantic efforts that our Democratic friends are making now, in the tail end of this session, to patch up their hurried legislation of the last nine months and save themselves, as far as it is possible to save themselves, from the impending catastrophe of the 7th of November.

The Clayton antitrust law was put upon the statute books a little less than two years ago. Its presentation and consideration were accompanied by the beating of Democratic tom-toms and the loud and triumphant braying of the Democratic donkey. It was announced as the perfect fruit of Democratic efforts to perfect our antitrust laws, the climax of pluperfect legislation to muzzle the octopus. The extraordinary thing about it all is that since the passage of this legislation our Democratic friends have forgotten there is or was or is likely to be such a thing as a trust or a combination in restraint of trade and harmful to the interests of the people. Time was, when the Republicans were in power and the majority was on this side, that the Democratic side was fairly littered with antitrust volcanoes that were as frequently in eruption as Vesuvius in her most active periods and almost as noisy when in operation. Since they have come into power, and since the passage of the Clayton antitrust law, these antitrust eruptive centers on the Democratic side have become as quiescent and peaceful as the surrounding green hills of Maryland and Virginia. The administration, taking its cue from the party in Congress, or vice versa, has not been able to find a trust since the Clayton antitrust law was passed, if in fact it has tried. One would imagine that all that was necessary under a Democratic administration to put an end to all of the evils of combinations in restraint of trade, conspiracies against the welfare of the people, was to put a few lines of legislation on the statute books and let it go at that.

During the consideration of the Clayton bill, section 9, which was later divided into sections 9 and 10, was proclaimed as being perhaps the most important of all the provisions of the bill. The committee told us in their report that they had placed section 9 in the bill in harmony with the recommendation of the President in his message to Congress on trusts, and they said that it was necessary to stop the practices of interlocking directorates that section prohibited, in order to insure the "perpetuity of our institutions," and they quoted the President to the effect that section 10 was tremendously important, not only for the perpetuity of the Republic but because—

> It will bring new men, new energies, a new spirit of initiative, into the management of our great business enterprises. It will open the field of industrial development and origination to scores of men who have been obliged to serve when their abilities entitled them to direct. It will immensely hearten the young men coming on and will greatly enrich the business activities of the whole country.

Glorious is legislation that will accomplish all these things even measurably, and the sooner the Congress can put that kind of legislation in full operation the better. But, lo and behold, a week ago Tuesday last, in the presence of a small handful, of whom I had not the honor to be one, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] called up Senate resolution 129, proposing to postpone for 12 months the operation of section 10, this important legislation enacted, so they told us, for the purpose of perpetuating our institutions, giving the young men a chance and enriching the business activities of the country.

Two years ago the Democratic side felt that it was highly important to save the Nation to give the young men an opportunity to enrich the life of the Nation. A week ago Tuesday it was apparently considered more important to save the Democratic Party than to save the Nation, and they evidently hoped to do by this resolution that deferred for 12 months this legislation said to be so tremendously important; this legislation that must be had, they told us, if our institutions are to be perpetuated; this legislation that must be enacted if young men are to have a chance and the business of the Nation is to be enlarged and enriched.

Now, we have another amendment proposed to this famous, this absolutely perfect, Clayton bill.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. What reason was given two weeks ago for deferring this provision?

Mr. MONDELL. Not a word, not a line in the RECORD of explanation. I assume that it was the exigencies of the campaign. I can think of no other reason. The gentleman on the Democratic side evidently thought that to put in operation this highly important legislation might in some way frighten these malefactors of great wealth whom they were ferociously pursuing two years ago, but who they are courting assiduously in this particular campaign, who they railed against to beat the band when we were in power, but have not been disposed to disturb in the slightest sense since they had control of every branch of the Government. They have not brought an important suit against a trust. Are we to assume it is because there are no wicked trusts under a Democratic administration?

Now we are presented with further legislation to modify this perfect Clayton Act, legislation under which we are to be given opportunities to practice upon the foreigner acts denied in our dealings among ourselves. There may be something in the hurriedly enacted hurrah Democratic bill amended by this act that renders this kind of legislation necessary. If they had been careful in the drafting of the laws affecting combinations, there would have been nothing on the statute book that would have prevented the doing of other things that are necessary in connection with the operation of organizations for the purpose of securing foreign trade. Heaven knows that we need to have every facility for that important work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there is no gentleman on this side who desires to speak upon the rule.

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, sometimes on an emigrant ship, when the passengers have been treated very badly during the voyage, the master of the ship tries to make the last day or so especially pleasant, so, if possible, to remove the memory of the days that are past. Proceeding along that line, the majority is evidently trying to make us forget some of the rules they have passed in the last nine months by bringing in a decent rule. Nobody can fairly criticize this rule, except in one particular, and that is the shortness of the time for general debate. This rule does not cut off our right of amendment, as was done in the naval bill, the shipping bill, and other bills. It does not limit the time under the five-minute rule, as has been done within the last nine months.

This rule does not provide for riders on appropriation bills, as some rules have done. It fulfills a legitimate purpose, and that is, in what we hope are the closing days of the session, to bring before the House legislation which the majority desires to consider under the ordinary rules of the House. If all the rules of the session, which is, we hope, closing, had had a similar virtue or merit, there would have been little to criticize in the rules; but when we come into power in the Sixty-fifth Congress, as we are going to do [applause on the Republican side], we will have abundant and ample precedents in what has been done in the Sixty-fourth Congress, although I hope and pray that we will have self-restraint enough to prevent ourselves from following the very natural impulse to shape our action on what was done to us in the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this rule will pass. People differ in their opinion as to the bill, but no one dissents from the opinion that the bill is important. This is the best way to bring it before the House.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to this rule, because, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] has just said, it is a fair rule, something that is very extraordinary during this Sixty-fourth Congress. As to whether or not I shall vote for the bill I shall determine when I have listened to the debate. In the two minutes that I have, however, Mr. Speaker, I do want to call to the attention of the House the complete reversal of position of the Democratic Party upon this question of trusts. In every national Democratic platform for the past 12 years, up to the platform of 1916, there was a plank in the platform reading as follows:

> Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products and articles of American manufacture which are sold abroad more cheaply than at home should be put upon the free list.

Then they proposed to penalize and punish every American manufacturer and combination which sold their products at prices abroad more cheaply than the prices they charged at home. In this bill, Mr. Speaker, they propose to legalize that very thing and put the hand of approval of the Government upon that very practice.

It may be that reasons exist why that should be done, in order to secure our share of the foreign trade, but, as I said a moment ago, you upon that side of the aisle have completely reversed your position in doing it, and in the platform of this year, 1916, Mr. Speaker, you will not find any such plank as that. Indeed, I have read the platform with some care, and you will not find the word "trust" in the Democratic platform of 1916 from the first line to the last. [Applause on the Republican side.] Are there any less trusts to-day than there were when you assumed the administration of this Government? Whom have you sent to jail? What trusts have you dissolved? Can you name one of them? Why is it that you were so brave in denouncing trusts when you were out of power, but now that you are in power you are as silent as the tomb with reference to them? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question? Is it the gentleman's intention to pass this bill to-night?

Mr. POU. We hope to.

Mr. KEATING. Then it will be necessary for me, Mr. Speaker, to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman mean the bill or the rule?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, I have no objection to the adoption of the rule, but I do object to the consideration of the bill at this late hour.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman making the point of order that there is no quorum present?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the point of no quorum if it is the intention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to press for final consideration of it to-night.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I can say as the author of the bill that there is no intention to press the final passage of it to-night, but I hope the gentleman will not object to the adoption of the rule and going into the Committee of the Whole and having some debate before we adjourn. Three hours of general debate are provided for, and it is my intention to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman in giving me time to discuss the bill, but this is an important measure and I do not think we should have a general discussion to-night. I do not object to the adoption of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I now make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MANN. We will meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and I think we may as well adjourn.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17350, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, for many years the manufacturers of this country have felt the need of the passage of this bill in order to clarify their rights in the foreign export trade. Ever since our export trade has been increasing, as it has been for the last 10 years, there has been grave doubt in the minds of good lawyers, patriotic lawyers, as to whether or not the Sherman law applied to exporters engaged solely and purely in the foreign export business. Many of the best lawyers, whose names I need not mention, have always thought that it did not apply, that the object of the Sherman law was to keep the channels of trade pure in the United States and in its Territories. In view of that situation, in view of the uncertain condition as to whether or not this famous law does apply to foreign export trade from the United States, the Federal Trade Commission, under section 6 of the bill we passed two years ago giving it authority to investigate both interstate and foreign trade, has made a very full and widespread investigation as to our export trade, and as to how export trade is carried on by foreign competitors. After their very full investigation they sent to the House of Representatives about two months ago a very strong report, signed by every member of that commission, showing, I think, conclusively to every sane man the absolute necessity for the clarification of the Sherman law in reference to the foreign export business along the lines of this bill. They have shown conclusively that unless American exporters engaged solely in the foreign export business are permitted to do business with foreign countries on the same lines as their foreign competitors do business and as the foreign countries in which business is done permits it to be done, that our foreign export business is bound to languish and in some instances die.

I know that there is a feeling among some that we ought to hold the American manufacturers wherever they do business in all the world to that same high business standard that is prescribed by the Sherman law for their doing business in the United States. I do not believe when I am putting a horse in an international race that it is incumbent upon me to put 100 pounds weight upon his back when every other horse in the race is not encumbered at all. I know from this Trade Commission's report that every foreign country whose manufacturers compete keenly with our manufacturers have no such rules to control them as the Sherman antitrust law throws around the American exporter if the Sherman law does apply to our exporters in foreign trade. To illustrate——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let me understand the gentleman. Is there anything in the Sherman antitrust law that forbids an American manufacturer from selling to foreign export trade at a price less than to the American consumer or jobber?

Mr. WEBB. Why, I do not think so. It is done every day. To illustrate that very point——

Mr. STAFFORD. This bill seeks, then, to permit the combination of any corporation organized for that purpose?

Mr. WEBB. For the purpose of carrying on the export trade; and the bill provides that if the selling agencies in the nature of corporations be in restraint of trade within the United States, then they are violating the Sherman antitrust law. The bill provides, further, that if one American sales agency or corporation for the purpose of carrying on export trade deals unfairly, even in a foreign country, with his American competitor that in that instance the Federal Trades Commission can call that unfair exporter before it and, if needs be, take its charter away from him.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. What is the meaning of "dealing unfairly with competitors"?

Mr. WEBB. Of course the gentleman knows that is hard to explain, because the Federal Trades Commission is a new body and they have not settled that question yet. It will take a good while for them to form a correct and lasting definition, just as it took a good many years for the Supreme Court to interpret correctly the Sherman antitrust law as to what "restraint of trade" meant.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman about international combinations. I will have to illustrate in this way: Suppose a combination for the sale of oil or for the sale or manufacture of steel has been formed which is just as strong in some foreign country as it is in the United States, and it is so well established in the foreign country that by reason of foreign wage conditions and foreign raw-material conditions it can readily compete with its own establishment in the United States; what effect would the lessening of the legal hold which we now have upon combinations be in a case of that kind?

Mr. WEBB. That is speculative, of course; but if the acts restrain trade or commerce in the United States, it is then unlawful.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose a combination in which Americans join with foreigners had been formed?

Mr. WEBB. Then you violate the antitrust law, and it has been so held by the court.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a partial answer. But suppose Americans join with Europeans in a combination, by reason of which it may be cheaper to produce in the foreign country than it is in the United States, what would the effect be on the American market?

Mr. WEBB. I think the effect might be a restraint of trade in the United States, and then they would run afoul of the American trust law, though this bill does not permit a sales agency to be a producing corporation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where would the independent come in on a deal of that kind?

Mr. WEBB. No more than he does now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has occurred to me that this bill might not be in the interest of the independent operator in the United States, but that it might be more in the interest of international combinations that could be formed with American connections.

Mr. WEBB. It absolutely gives no license to do any such thing, I will say to my friend, and the moment that sort of thing is done they would be subject to the penalties of the Sherman antitrust law. The Sherman law is preserved inviolate as to all acts that would restrain trade in the United States. It is not weakened one whit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bill repeals that section of the Clayton antitrust law which prohibits the ownership of stock by one company in another?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And as far as foreign——

Mr. WEBB. They are selling agencies that are engaged solely in the sale of American goods in a foreign country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is posted on this bill.

He will recall that in the Clayton antitrust bill, which was largely engineered through the House by the gentleman from North Carolina, provision was made assuming to protect independents, that is to say, that was the supposition throughout the country, by preventing a large manufacturer from making a contract for a sole selling agency in any one State.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is true; and that was in keeping with the antitrust law, and that very identical bill—and I do not believe the gentleman voted for it, but many Republicans did—provided that exclusive agencies in this country, made upon condition with merchants not to sell competitors' goods, should be unlawful in the United States. The Clayton bill went further and provided that price cutting for the purpose of injuring a competitor should be unlawful within the United States, but not in foreign countries. This bill is in keeping with that very idea in sections 2 and 3 of the Clayton law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the Attorney General of the United States been consulted as to the effect of this bill?

Mr. WEBB. He has not been consulted by myself, I will say. I do not know of anyone else who has consulted him, if anyone has.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been brought into the House, because there is a question of doubt amongst lawyers as to whether there is now existing law that would prevent the formation of combinations such as are proposed. Is that the fact?

Mr. WEBB. There is doubt on that very question, and we want to clarify it and make it known to the manufacturers of this country so far as we are concerned that we propose to compel them to follow the American business rules where the American flag floats, but whenever they get into a foreign country we propose to give them the same latitude and give them rights to do business on the same scale as their foreign competitors do. I do not think anybody can object to that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman feel that under this bill the American manufacturer who is not in a combination would be protected as well as if this bill were not enacted?

Mr. WEBB. He certainly would not be in any worse fix than he is now.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. One of the purposes of this bill is to allow American manufacturers to employ a common selling agent or agency in a foreign country?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; to form common selling agencies. American manufacturers can not combine, understand. It must be for the purpose of selling articles in foreign countries made in this country. The bill does not permit a combination of manufacturers. It permits a number of manufacturers to create an agency in a foreign country. A dozen manufacturers can take stock in a selling agency and have the overhead charges reduced, and enable them to compete with foreign competitors engaged in that sort of business.

Mr. MANN. And that would reduce the competition between manufacturers here?

Mr. WEBB. No. It would reduce the competition between American manufacturers in foreign countries, probably.

Mr. MANN. What position will we be in with reference to them demanding that right in foreign countries under section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act as amended?

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman mean the dumping clause?

Mr. MANN. I mean section 73 of the Wilson Tariff Act, the act of 1894, which, as recently amended by Congress, makes it a penalty for any importer or agent to make any combination here or elsewhere, for that matter, which affects competition or which has a tendency to raise prices of imported articles. How will we stand with foreign countries, giving the right here to our manufacturers to have a common selling agency which cuts out competition abroad, and then saying to foreign manufacturers, "If you do the same thing here, we will send your men to the penitentiary or fine you"?

Mr. WEBB. Well, I do not think it says that, to begin with.

Mr. MANN. Well, possibly, the gentleman has not read this provision.

Mr. WEBB. And in the next place, the bill does not authorize anybody to do business in a foreign country in violation of the laws of the country in which the business is carried on.

Mr. MANN. I understand that, but——

Mr. WEBB. And, in the next place, I am not sure that the combination that is authorized in this bill means the raising of prices in foreign countries. It may mean the lowering of prices, and the lowering of the prices, in view of the reduced overhead charges, will enable manufacturers here to even sell at a less price and still to make more money than they are making at present.

Mr. MANN. The purpose of it is to affect free competition. That is the purpose of it. But what position will we be in, in the case I have pointed out, if this legislation is enacted? That is what I want to get at. If we allow the restriction of competition on the part of our manufacturers in foreign countries and then propose a penalty on the foreign manufacturers who wish to employ a common selling agency here, it might be a temporary benefit, but——

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that he assumes that every industry in this country is going to organize into one selling agency, which, of course, is preposterous.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. WEBB. On the other hand, I predict that there will be scores of selling agencies competing with each other in the same class of foreign business.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I am in perfect sympathy with the purpose of this bill, and I will probably vote for it; but it seems to me that we are in a rather awkward position to say that we penalize here a thing which we propose to allow our own people abroad to do. I do not know how other countries will look upon that proposition. They may consent to it, perhaps, but——

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that persons and corporations of other countries are doing here practically every day in the year what we propose to authorize our people to do in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. Then, in that case, the facts should be called to the attention of the Department of Justice.

Mr. WEBB. I am told that one firm or selling agency in New York buys raw materials in the United States for fourteen hundred different foreign concerns. The foreign manufacturers not only have the buying agencies here, but they have cartels and contracts and agreements which enable them to undersell us in the finished products in foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. Those combinations, when they exist abroad, we can not punish; but we have a statute, passed in 1913, which came through the gentleman's committee, probably, or through the Committee on Ways and Means, amending section 73 of the Wilson tariff act of 1894——

Mr. WEBB. It came from the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. MANN. Which forbids any combination of importers or agents or anything of the sort affecting free competition. That is still the law. If it is being violated, as suggested by the gentleman, it is not our fault.

Mr. WEBB. The Trade Commission's report would indicate that it is being violated.

Mr. MANN. I understood some time ago that the Secretary of Commerce stated that we would be in an awkward position in international affairs if we propose to allow something to be done abroad which we forbid the people abroad to do here.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of Commerce in his annual report recommends the passage of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I am asking what the effect will be. I expect to support the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I am trying to explain the purpose of the bill before the House.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. It all comes up.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The bill will not restrict the number of employment agencies or selling agencies in a foreign country?

Mr. WEBB. No; we protect them in the bill, and in case there is unfair competition between these agencies the Trade Commission can take their charters away from them, if one is guilty of unfair methods.

Mr. FIELDS. We have hundreds of manufacturers in this same line of commodities who, because of their limited capital, can not go into a foreign country, but 10 can organize an agency, and 10 others can organize another agency, and so on, and therefore it would make competition instead of defeating competition.

Mr. WEBB. Yes. My judgment is that these selling agencies authorized now will enable our manufacturers and selling agencies in foreign countries to sell cheaper than they do now and at the same time make money, because their overhead charges will be proportionately smaller. We have got to provide some way in which to sell our goods in foreign countries in competition with foreign sales agencies.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would like to get the gentleman's understanding of the effect of this measure. I want to know if this is not a fact, that under the provisions of this bill there is absolutely no restriction or limitation as to the cooperation or combination that may be formed between concerns in the United States engaged in the foreign trade?

Mr. WEBB. There are restrictions. Here is one, which I will read:

Provided, That such association, agreement, or act is not in restraint of trade within the United States.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes. That is not what I mean. Take, for instance, the United States Steel Corporation, which controls, we will say, 40 per cent of the production of iron and steel in the United States. Now, then, under this law, if passed as presented, the United States Steel Corporation and all the independent concerns engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel in this country can unite together and organize a corporation and engage in the sale of iron and steel abroad?

Mr. WEBB. If that combination will enable them to get a better price from foreigners than they get now, I want them to get it, just so it does not affect prices in the United States.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. It is a fact that they could form such a combination under this bill? There is no restriction as long as they carry out the law?

Mr. WEBB. That is what is done in a great many foreign countries.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Is not that the effect of this law?

Mr. WEBB. They can do it, indeed they can. The object of the bill is to let them do what their rivals do and which is allowed in the countries in which they operate.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is what I thought, that there is absolutely no restriction.

Mr. WEBB. The only restriction is that their combination shall not restrain trade in the United States.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Suppose the iron manufacturers and woolen manufacturers and cotton manufacturers and all the different lines of manufacture united in a corporation to sell abroad, does not the gentleman think that would give them practically a monopoly in the United States?

Mr. WEBB. I not only do not think so, but I know it will not. The formation of such a corporation is a business impossibility. The gentleman has an idea that nobody else in the world manufactures steel and iron and lumber except ourselves. The very trouble now which the lumber interests have to contend with is that they come in competition with such buying and selling agencies throughout the world, and have no similar weapons with which to meet their competitor. Remember that when these combinations are formed, they are formed to meet competition in foreign countries, and they have got to sell their goods in foreign countries to make a living. They have got to sell in competition with foreign countries, and they have got to sell, therefore, at such prices that will meet foreign competition. Therefore what the gentleman suggests is impossible or impracticable.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Briefly.

Mr. CLINE. I understand this bill permits combinations to establish a selling agency in foreign countries?

Mr. WEBB. Selling agencies for export trade.

Mr. CLINE. And that is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Does the bill also provide that these same combinations may establish a purchasing agency for purchasing raw materials in those same foreign markets?

Mr. WEBB. No; but it is assumed that they can buy in America what they sell in foreign countries.

Mr. CLINE. But they could not establish a joint agency for the purchasing of raw materials abroad.

Mr. WEBB. The bill does not provide that. It is confined to "export," and "export" can not mean "import."

Mr. CLINE. Does it provide anything against it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the bill is confined to export business, and such selling agency can not be a producing corporation; only a buying and selling agency in export trade.

Mr. CLINE. Suppose an agency is established for the purchasing of raw materials in foreign countries. For instance, suppose cotton manufacturers or other manufacturers should establish a purchasing agency in foreign countries, how would that affect the man in this country who is not in the combination for the purchase of raw materials?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it would affect him any more than it does now, but this agency could not engage in import business, and hence could not buy for this purpose. World competition is going to keep the price down, and is bound to, as long as there is competition in the markets of the world. And should there be any effort to monopolize to raise prices in this country the Sherman law would stop it at once. As long as there are selling corporations and agencies they are not going to hold their goods and thus lose money. They are going to dispose of them at the best prices possible. Should their holding them restrain trade in the United States they would be liable under the Sherman law.

Mr. CLINE. There is no purpose in forming a purchasing agency except to buy goods more cheaply than individuals can buy them. Now if a corporation of this character buys raw material more cheaply abroad, to be brought here and manufactured, would not that have an injurious effect on the man who is not a member of that purchasing agency?

Mr. WEBB. That would not come under the terms of this bill. As I said before, the agency is confined to "export" business. The selling agency could not manufacture the raw material because the bill forbids such agencies or corporations to produce anything.

Mr. CLINE. There is nothing in the bill to prohibit it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; there is. An agency can not buy material in a foreign country and bring it here and manufacture it. If such were done, and thereby restrain trade within the United States, they would immediately violate the provision of the antitrust law. An association formed under this bill can only engage in export trade, and hence would not be permitted to buy raw material in foreign countries or any other material for "import" into the United States. Some think we should allow the buying agencies for import trade, but this bill does not permit such, but only agencies or associations to engage solely in export trade.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would it be in restraint of trade for that agency to buy material cheaper than an independent manufacturer in the United States might buy material, although the result would be that one would get the material cheaper than the other, and in that way be able to manufacture at less cost and to sell at a lower price? Would that be a restraint of trade?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think that would be, unless there were some conspiracy. Take the instance of copper. Copper sells for eighty-five one hundredths of a cent higher in the United States than it is sold in foreign countries to foreign buyers who are in the combination of buyers, and the American copper when it is manufactured into wire, the American manufacturer has to pay about a cent a pound more for copper than his foreign competitor, and when he sells his wire in a foreign country he has to compete with the well-organized combinations of foreign wire manufacturers.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Indiana asked a question, and I want to know whether the gentleman is correct or not. He asked you if this bill permitted of associations abroad. Does not the bill permit the selling agencies in the United States for foreign export?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly it does, but it must be of individual or a corporation engaged solely in the export trade, and it can not be a manufacturing or a producing corporation.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the selling agency must be abroad. I thought that was wrong.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Under this law the power given to one corporation to buy out the stock of another corporation seems to be dangerous. One corporation might buy the stock of all of the other corporations interested in foreign trade and thereby become a monopoly.

Mr. WEBB. That can be done to-day; but if it is done the Sherman antitrust law applies, because it would affect the commerce of the United States in restraint of trade.

Mr. HARDY. You expressly permit one concern to buy the stock of another.

Mr. WEBB. On that point we are following along the line of our recent bank legislation. We passed a law the other day—and I do not think there was a vote against it—permitting the banks in the United States to take stock in a common American bank in foreign countries. That is all there is which permits an American manufacturer to buy stock in these agencies.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is it not a fact that the first section of this bill absolutely restricts it to goods going out of the country?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; export business.

Mr. HILL. And section 73 of the old Wilson law as now amended absolutely controls corporations and individuals in bringing them into the country.

Mr. WEBB. I think so.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not one purpose of this bill to enable the sale of articles abroad cheaper than they are sold here at home?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not say that.

Mr. SLOAN. Would not that be one of the legitimate effects of the passage of this legislation?

Mr. WEBB. It might so happen that they would have to sell cheaper abroad to meet competition, just as is done to-day.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not a provision that would necessarily bring prices lower?

Mr. WEBB. It is to meet the competition by less cost in the distribution of goods.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not that a departure from the old doctrine against selling articles abroad cheaper than they are sold in this country?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I hope my friend will not divert me on that point. The gentleman called it an old doctrine, and we are talking about to-day and conditions which confront us now, at the present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield for a brief statement?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to state the situation in San Francisco.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman would prefer, I will yield to him later on that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Very well.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. KING. Under this bill could a selling agency be established for the purpose of dealing in foodstuffs for export?

Mr. WEBB. I think so.

Mr. KING. Like shipping grain and cattle and the products of the American farm.

Mr. WEBB. I think so.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think that such an agency would have any effect in controlling the prices that men got for their products in this country?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not. Some think that it will enhance the price of the farmers' products because the more goods that you sell in foreign countries the more demand there is for the goods here.

Mr. KING. Would not this selling agency say to the farmers of Illinois we will give you so much for your grain and take care of you at such a figure?

Mr. WEBB. They would buy it so as to sell it in competition with the world sellers, and foreign buyers would be in constant competition with the American agency in purchasing from the Illinois farmer.

Mr. KING. And in that way might they not control the export trade in grain?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think that is possible, because the foreign agent is always here buying for his foreign clients or patrons, which would keep up keen competition.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Is it not true that all the exporters could form a combination under this bill?

Mr. WEBB. They might do it, but such is an extreme supposition. We are not the only country that produces grain. We export a very small proportion of our production of wheat and corn.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. If all of the exporters of grain were in one corporation, does the gentleman not think that there is danger that they would be in a position, controlling the outlet of our farm products abroad, to control them at home? Does the gentleman not think that they might by buying the farmers' goods depress the market and then for the purpose of making profit, they having a control of this vast stock of grain, raise the price abroad? Would they not have that power?

Mr. WEBB. No; I think they would have to lower the price abroad in competition with the world, and in lowering the price, having a common selling agency and making it cheaper to carry on business, they might make more money while still selling it at the same price, and the moment the agency by its acts restrained trade here the trust laws would interfere.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Let me present this. I am really in earnest, and I have heard this argument presented——

Mr. WEBB. I understand the gentleman is going to ask for 40 minutes to debate this bill, and I desire to answer some other questions before I conclude.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I understand that one object of certain corporations is that they claim, as the gentleman has said, taking for example the question of copper, that the foreign buyers of copper will not pay our producers a fair price, and we are compelled to sell to them at any price that they desire to pay. Do not the copper interests think that this bill will help them, because they think they can fix the price and compel these people to pay whatever they want to or to pay a fair price? And if they can do that with copper, then, when they can get control of wheat and corn, they can do the same with that.

Mr. WEBB. Would the gentleman object to the copper producers of this country getting as much from the foreign buyer as they get from our own people? I would like to see them get a little more, so far as I am concerned. And if they can get no better price from foreign buyers, I should like to make it possible for them to make a little better profit upon what they do sell abroad.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would object to a combination of copper interests that would control the foreign price and in that way control the price here.

Mr. WEBB. If they attempt to control prices here, they violate the law. The only way that you can assume that they can control the foreign price is to assume that we have a world monopoly. The gentleman forgets that they are coming into competition with all of the world, and it is to their interest to sell and to meet the competition of the world.

The gentleman forgets that there is some one else in the world than the United States, and we have to meet their competition, and there would be no incentive for an American selling agency to buy up things and hold them while the rest of the world are supplying the world markets with the goods that he is holding.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the gentleman concedes that the establishment of these selling agencies in foreign countries would entail considerable expense?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; great expense in some cases.

Mr. DEWALT. And I suppose the gentleman also concedes that the formation of corporations as selling agencies would also entail expense?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. And the gentleman also concedes, I suppose, that there are a great number of manufacturers in this country who are largely engaged in the manufacture of one product, and that there are also a great many small manufacturers. That is so, is it not?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. Those premises being correct, and having formed your corporation, does the gentleman appreciate the danger that might ensue in this way, that the large dealers or manufacturers would form such a corporation, which the gentleman admits entails large expense in foreign countries and entails large expense in this country, and would not permit the small manufacturers to get into that selling combination?

Mr. WEBB. My answer to that is this: The small manufacturer would be no worse off then than he is now. He can not compete individually now. He has no foreign business of consequence. His remedy would be to form a combination with smaller manufacturers, and if the big selling agency treats the little fellow unfairly, we have provided in the bill a means by which their charter may be taken away from them, even though their unfair competition is in a foreign country.

Mr. DEWALT. Would not the gentleman say it was treating the small manufacturer unfairly not to admit him to the corporation? They could raise the price of the stock.

Mr. WEBB. I think every one has the right to choose his own business associates, but surely the small men the gentleman is talking about have some friends with whom they could unite in a selling agency.

Mr. DEWALT. I want to say to the gentleman I am in sympathy with the purposes of this bill.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that.

Mr. DEWALT. But the question that was in my mind was that possibly it might militate against the small manufacturer because he could not come into this association.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say this: The Standard Oil Co. does not need this bill. The Harvester people do not need this bill. The Steel Corporation does not need it, and other big corporations do not need it. This bill is not at all in the interest of the big corporations of the United States. They already have their selling agencies established in the countries of the world. Being so big and powerful and being such tremendous producers they can compete in any foreign countries and are doing it. It is the little fellow who has not the capital or the money to go into foreign countries to seek trade, it is for him; for a dozen or so to unite so that they can carry and show their goods abroad at a reduced cost in their overhead charges. It is really in the interest of the little fellow; it is in the interest of the small manufacturer.

Mr. DEWALT. Conceding that what the gentleman may say may be correct, the gentleman's theory, then, is that these small manufacturers, by combining, could then compete with the large manufacturers, if they do enter into an association?

Mr. WEBB. That is exactly my idea, I want to say to my friend.

Mr. DEWALT. I would be very glad if it worked out.

Mr. WEBB. They can not be any worse off than they are at present. They can not compete individually with their foreign rivals. They can not send their goods abroad, unless somebody comes over here and happens to pick them out and buy them—and little business comes that way nowadays. If they could get any way to carry their goods and show them in foreign countries, they could compete. That is the custom to-day. You have to have money; you have to have combination enough to carry these goods to the foreign countries and show them to the people in order to induce them to buy them.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield, for a question.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to inquire if under this bill it is possible to organize another Standard Oil Company which will be international?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. The Sherman antitrust law would destroy it.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not it also possible that this combination may be formed and so used that it will not only take care of the sales abroad but it will also control the markets here by its refusal to let other persons or factories come into this combination?

Mr. WEBB. My friend has read the bill. It says that these agencies may be formed provided they do not restrain trade within the United States, or deal unfairly with their American competitors.

Mr. DOWELL. But will not the operation itself, the fact that they have such an enormous international combination and being able to sell their goods at a lower price in other markets, be in itself sufficient——

Mr. WEBB. No; the copper interests do that now.

Mr. DOWELL. It is true they may keep any exporter now out of this combination they may organize.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know to what the gentleman refers as "they."

Mr. DOWELL. I mean this organization.

Mr. WEBB. Any number of business men can form a selling agency. There is no power in Congress preventing a man from selecting his associates.

Mr. DOWELL. As far as that is concerned, this organization may be as large as they may desire to organize.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; providing it does not restrain trade in the United States. I do not care how big they are, for they have to be big in order to compete with their big competitors in foreign countries.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a questions?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; for a question.

Mr. HILL. Sometimes an ounce of illustration is worth a pound of argument. I traveled for two days with the agent of Walter A. Wood in Siberia. He was going about showing the farmers how to use machines. They could afford to do that. This gives the little fellows who can not afford it the privilege of combining and doing the same thing.

Mr. WEBB. That is exactly my idea, and that is the class of manufacturers that are going to be helped by the bill, because the big fellows have already got the power to establish these agencies now and they already have them established.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all the time I shall use at the present time, and I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use some of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina how long he expects to continue to-night?

Mr. WEBB. I think I will move to rise at 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I think we had best quit now.

Mr. WEBB. Let us run until 6 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. We meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, and then we may be in session all night to-morrow night. Nobody knows.

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman is tired, to quit now. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17350) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce that to-morrow, so Members can be here promptly, most probably we will try to get up for consideration legislation relative to the pending strike situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] announces that to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m. we will try to get up the strike legislation.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that means trying to get consideration of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman intimate, as the chairman of the committee—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] says he has not copies of the bill—what the general scope of it is, so that the Members may have time to think it out overnight?

Mr. ADAMSON. The bill only embraces the propositions which the President originally made to the employees and the carriers, to wit, to put in force immediately the eight-hour day, without affecting the surrounding circumstances and conditions, and appoint a commission to investigate conditions and the working of the eight-hour law, in six to nine months, in their discretion, and to report to Congress their finding of fact without recommending any legislation. We introduced the bill in that shape because it is what the President originally proposed and what the brotherhoods agreed to accept, and we thought if Congress would pass that much legislation it would be entirely consistent with what had been done, and the employees could not afford to go out on strike, as they are committed to those provisions.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House, under its original order, adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, Friday, September 1, 1916.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TAVENNER: A bill (H. R. 17699) authorizing and directing the Public Printer to provide a pulp and paper mill or mills for the manufacture of print paper for the Government; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. NEELY: A bill (H. R. 17705) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Keffer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 17706) granting an increase of pension to John T. Whetzal; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 17707) granting an increase of pension to U. J. Favorite; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of New York: A bill (H. R. 17708) granting a pension to Christein Stewart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STAFFORD: A bill (H. R. 17709) granting a pension to Sabina Fallon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRUMBAUGH: Petition of Nicholas Wirthwein, Louis Seibert, George Ewall, Peter Albritz, A. H. Werder, Emil Weiderhald, Joseph King, Charles F. Gerhold, and other citizens of Columbus, Ohio, protesting against Great Britain's seizure of mails and noncontraband supplies consigned to neutral ports; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CURRY: Petition of State Board of Viticultural Commissioners of California, that the impending railroad strike may be avoided, and that the Congress will take proper steps to insure the steady and unhampered shipment of freight; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of California Electric Railway Association, asking that electric railways earning less than 15 per cent of revenue from interstate traffic be exempted from proposed railway legislation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of Vallejo Trades and Labor Council in behalf of an eight-hour day and other legislation proposed in behalf of railway employees; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of certain railway employees of Brighton, Cal., favoring the passage of the so-called railroad employees' eight-hour-day bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petition of William T. Appleton, of Boston, Mass., favoring passage of the game-sanctuary bill, House bill 11712; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of Philadelphia Bourse, relative to regulating actions of public-service employees; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. EDMONDS: Petition of Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring principles of arbitration; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FLYNN: Petition of William T. Appleton, of Boston, Mass., favoring passage of the game-sanctuary bill, House bill 17130; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of Philadelphia Bourse, relative to regulating certain public-service employees; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington: Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, against bills to amend the postal laws; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. LAFEAN: Petition of Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association, to support tariff bill for protection to American industries; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MATTHEWS: Evidence to accompany House bill 17695, for the relief of William L. Wiles; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: Petitions of Tenth Avenue Baptist Church, of Oakland; Washington Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Pasadena; and Garvanza Methodist Episcopal Church, of Los Angeles, all in the State of California, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: Memorial of Chamber of Commerce of Dallas, Tex., favoring arbitration of labor disputes with railroad companies; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of City Council of Lawrence, Mass., relative to returning to their homes, etc., men who volunteered for their country's service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TINKHAM: Memorial of City Council of Lawrence, relative to restoring to homes and families men who volunteered for their country's service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS of Ohio: Petition of Deposits Saving & Trust Co., of Akron, Ohio, in re interference with transmission of mails; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 1, 1916.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee this morning under the pressure of a national crisis, facing issues which we must face in the fear of God, with the love of our brother man in our hearts. We ask for divine guidance and wisdom. We pray that there may be no conflict of interest that will separate heart from heart in this blessed fellowship of our national life, but that we may be enabled to see and to discern that there is no conflict of duty and no conflict of interest in this land of ours. Thou hast put into our hands in trust great responsibilities. Thou hast lavished the wealth of a great Nation upon us. Thou hast also given to us great principles of government as a part of our trust. Grant that we may draw from Thee such wisdom and grace as that we may justify our stewardship before God and men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair and directed that the Journal be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, August 29, 1916, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 541).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental and additional estimate of appropriation, in the sum of $60,000, required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, for public printing and binding, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate telegrams from the executive committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, of New York City; from the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, of Baltimore, Md.; and from the Chamber of Commerce and Federation of Allied Interests, of Tulsa, Okla., all bearing upon the subject of the threatened railway strike, which will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Edgeley and La Moure, in the State of North Dakota, praying for the prohibition of the exportation of intoxicating liquor to Africa, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Grand Forks, N. Dak., remonstrating against the proposed enactment of legislation for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Ludden, N. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory observance of Sunday in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHELAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of California, remonstrating against the proposed retention of the stamp tax on insurance companies, which were ordered to lie on the table.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. TAGGART. My attention has been called to the bill (H. R. 17183) to prevent the enlistment of negroes in the military service of the United States. I addressed a letter to the Secretary of War on the subject and have received a reply from him. I ask that my letter, together with the reply of the Secretary of War and the bill referred to, which is short, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREST RESERVATIONS AND THE PROTECTION OF GAME,
August 28, 1916.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: My attention has been called to H. R. 17183, introduced in the House of Representatives July 27, 1916, which I am inclosing herewith.

This bill states that hereafter there shall not be enlisted or reenlisted in the military service of the United States, either in the Army or Navy, any person of the negro or colored race.

I feel sure that this bill does not meet with the wishes of the War Department. There are several occasions that call to my mind the valor and loyalty of the negro soldiers, and only recently their bravery was shown at Carrizal, Mexico.

I am opposed to this bill.

Hoping to hear from your department that this bill does not meet with your approval, and with personal regards, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

T. TAGGART.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 30, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS TAGGART,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have received your letter of August 28 and read the copy of H. R. 17183 which you inclosed.

My attention had not been before called to this bill, and, so far as I know, it has not been referred to this department for opinion. The purpose of the bill is to prevent the enlistment or reenlistment of people of the colored race in the military service of the United States. Any such bill would receive the disapproval and adverse recommendation of this department.

Those who are familiar with the history of our country from the armies organized by George Washington in the American Revolution down to the present day know that brave and often conspicuously gallant service has been rendered by colored troops. In the most recent instance, at Carrizal, in Mexico, these colored troops conducted themselves with the greatest intrepidity, and reflected nothing but honor upon the uniform they wore.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

A bill (H. R. 17183) to prevent the enlistment of negroes in the military service of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there shall not be enlisted or reenlisted in the military service of the United States, either in the Army or Navy, any person of the negro or colored race.

SEC. 2. All laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 1724) to reimburse the First National Bank of Owatonna, Minn., for revenue stamps stolen or lost in transit, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 845) thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 6862. A bill for the relief of Amos Dahuff (Rept. No. 848); and

H. R. 3223. An act for the relief of John W. Baggott (Rept. No. 849).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 169) interpreting section 50 of the act of June 3, 1916, for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purpose, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 847) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 784) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Belton, Mont., for hotel purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 846) thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1568) to correct the military record of Adolph F. Hitchler, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 856) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4667) for the relief of James Duffy, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 855) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted a report thereon:

H. R. 1358. An act for the relief of Everett H. Corson (Rept. No. 850);

H. R. 1568. An act for the relief of N. Ferro (Rept. No. 851); and

H. R. 3238. An act for the relief of Sarah E. Elliott (Rept. No. 852).

Mr. BRYAN, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 1963. An act for the relief of John E. Keys (Rept. No. 836);

H. R. 12145. An act for the relief of Joseph Manning (Rept. No. 837);

H. R. 12240. An act for the relief of John Brodie (Rept. No. 838);

H. R. 13106. An act for the relief of the trustee and parties who are now or who may hereafter become interested in the estate of James A. Chamberlain under the terms of his will (Rept. No. 839);

H. R. 13820. An act for the relief of Mrs. Jennie Buttner (Rept. No. 840);

H. R. 14572. An act for the relief of Gertie Foss (Rept. No. 841);

H. R. 14645. An act for the relief of the legal representative of P. H. Aylett (Rept. No. 842); and

H. R. 14784. An act for the relief of Alma Provost (Rept. No. 843).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2535) for the relief of A. H. Rebentish, submitted an adverse report (No. 844) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10007) for the relief of William H. Woods, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11685) for the relief of Ivy L. Merrill, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6145) for the relief of Edward F. McDermott, alias James Williams, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 857) thereon.

Mr. BECKHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 61) to correct the military record of Samuel D. Chase, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 5759) for the relief of James Dodds, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 5184) for the relief of Ephraim A. Brown, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I reported back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 17235) granting the consent of Congress to W. H. Crosby; W. H. Andrews; E. G. Connette; Daniel Good; Henry May; Robert C. Gaupp; Edward Kener, jr.; William F. MacGlashan; and William A. Morgan to construct a bridge across Niagara River within or near the city limits of Buffalo, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 854) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it had been suggested to me that there was more or less opposition to this bill, but upon investigation and inquiry I find no ground for it, and I believe the bill ought to pass.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 6, after the name "MacGlashan," to insert "Eugene L. Falk; John W. Robinson; John M. Willys; Oliver Cabana, jr.; Conrad E. Wettlaufer; H. A. Hurt; George J. Meyer; Myron S. Hall; John Lord O'Brian; Frank S. McGraw," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to W. H. Crosby; W. H. Andrews; E. G. Connette; Daniel Good; Henry May; Robert C. Gaupp; Edward Kener, jr.; William F. MacGlashan; Eugene L. Falk; John W. Robinson; John M. Willys; Oliver Cabana, jr.; Conrad E. Wettlaufer; H. A. Hurt; George J. Meyer; Myron S. Hall; John Lord O'Brian; Frank S. McGraw; and William A. Morgan, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Niagara River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, within or near the city limits of Buffalo, in the county of Erie, in the State of New York, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That subject to the provisions of this act the Secretary of War may permit the persons herein named to construct a tunnel or tunnels under said river in lieu of the bridge herein authorized, in accordance with the foregoing act approved March 23, 1906, so far as the same may be applicable.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge or tunnels is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act granting the consent of Congress to W. H. Crosby; W. H. Andrews; E. G. Connette; Daniel Good; Henry May; Robert C. Gaupp; Edward Kener, jr.; William F. MacGlashan; Eugene L. Falk; John W. Robinson; John M. Willys; Oliver Cabana, jr.; Conrad E. Wettlaufer; H. A. Hurt; George J. Meyer; Myron S. Hall; John Lord O'Brian; Frank S. McGraw; and William A. Morgan to construct a bridge across Niagara River within or near the city limits of Buffalo, and for other purposes."

JOHN P. SUTTON.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 16719) for the relief of John P. Sutton, and I submit a report (No. 853) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. It is a House bill and is very short.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will explain it to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I desire the Senator to do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This person enlisted under the name of Gilbert Sutton and served three years in the Army. His real name was John P. Sutton. The bill has passed the House. It simply proposes to give him an honorable discharge in his real name instead of his wrong name. There is no question of desertion. He had a good record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the administration of the pension laws John P. Sutton, who enlisted in Company H, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, on the 27th day of March, 1866, under the name of Gilbert Sutton, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment under his true name of John P. Sutton.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STERLING (by request):

A bill (S. 6977) for the relief of Elmer Stevenson; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 6978) to correct the military record of Paul Hubner; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 6979) granting an increase of pension to Samuel J. Rhodes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 6980) granting a pension to Alfred P. Crump; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 6982) granting an increase of pension to Nellie A. Belden (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—AUGUSTUS BOYD.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 594) to place on the retired list with the rank of captain, Augustus Boyd, Fifty-fourth Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when we adjourned yesterday until 10 o'clock this morning it was understood that the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce would be ready to report to the Senate a bill dealing with the railroad situation. We are now advised that the chairman will not be able to present a bill before 11 o'clock. We are also advised that a Republican conference has been called to meet at 10 o'clock, and it is desired that we shall take a recess in order to enable them to proceed with their conference. I therefore move——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has not yet closed. Will the Senator withhold the motion for a few moments and let us dispose of the routine morning business? It will require only a little further time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not in order to move a recess at any time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the Chair is inclined to hold that the motion would be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I have stated, the other side have called a conference to meet at 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair merely made the suggestion to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is now past the hour of 10. Of course, if there is any special matter that needs attention, I would not insist on it.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will yield to me, I can name a special matter, and I hope the Senator will not make the motion to take a recess. I want to move to take up from the calendar the 640-acre homestead bill, a House bill which should be passed by the Senate. It is a short bill, and it will not take long to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a bill on the calendar and does not take precedence of the routine business.

Mr. MYERS. I should like very much to have the Senate attend to some business this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from North Carolina is in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make the motion because I think it is due to the other side of the Chamber, who have called their conference for 10 o'clock. Their conference, I understand, is to consider the very grave questions that are now pending. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 1 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the motion will not prevail. I want the Senate to take up the 640-acre homestead bill.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Question!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate take a recess until 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 12 minutes a. m.) the Senate took a recess until 1 o'clock p. m., at which hour it reassembled.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Overman	Simmons
Bankhead	Kenyon	Page	Smith, Ariz.
Chamberlain	Kern	Penrose	Smith, Md.
Clapp	Lane	Phelan	Smoot
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Swanson
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Taggart
Fletcher	Lewis	Ransdell	Thomas
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Robinson	Underwood
Gronna	Myers	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Hitchcock	Newlands	Sheppard	Warren
Husting	O'Gorman	Shields	Williams

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. DU PONT, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. VARDAMAN, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. BECKHAM entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I introduce a bill and ask that it be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 6981) to establish the eight-hour standard workday in interstate transportation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MADISON, WIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 14391) authorizing the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Madison, Wis., was read twice by its title.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that this bill, which has passed the House, be considered by the Senate. I will say that it proposes simply to change $55,000 that was appropriated in 1913 to tear down the old building at Madison, Wis., and erect on the site a new building. They have since ascertained that it would be much better to sell the land on which it was proposed to tear down the old building and buy a new site upon which to erect a new post-office building.

This bill has passed the House. It simply provides that the old site may be sold, the money paid into the Treasury, and the amount of money appropriated heretofore shall be available for the purchase of a site and the erection of the new building. There is no increase of appropriation at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt this is a good bill but——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that it go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 17645. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on September 1, 1916, approved and signed the following act:

S. 5103. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to lease to Charleston-Dunbar Traction Co. a certain strip or parcel of land owned by the United States Government on the Great Kanawha River in West Virginia.

THE REVENUE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 16763.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16763) to increase the revenue, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 135, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "a part of the classified service" and substitute the words "appointed from the list of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I suggested on yesterday, in the shipping bill and the so-called compensation bill I offered a similar amendment in each case providing that these appointments shall be made from the classified service. There are a large number of men and women on the eligible list who have spent their money and given their time to take examinations. Examinations are now being held all over the country for the purpose of increasing the eligible list. It is very bad legislation, as I look at it, to provide that the subordinate officials shall be appointed without reference to the civil service of the country.

I have not had time to look at those bills as they finally became laws to see what became of the amendment the Senate put in, without any opposition whatever, whether they remained in the bill; but whether they did or not, Mr. President, there is every reason why the amendment I have offered should be agreed to by the Senate, which I trust will be the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think in connection with this provision of the bill it would be interesting to note the provisions of the various laws that have been passed during this Congress with reference to the civil service, and I am going to take the time of the Senate just for a little while to call attention to those various provisions.

This administration is run on a "state-of-mind" plan, on a psychological basis and on the theory that what it says is, is. If the people can be hypnotized by a wave of the hand and a command or dictum into accepting this theory of running the Government, we may see it followed through another four years. The President tells the people that their ills do not in fact exist, and expects them to believe it, and he tells the business interests that the difficulties under which they labor are only psychological, and that is supposed to end their troubles.

Time and again crude, cumbersome, expensive, and half-digested laws have been signed with great ostentation and elaborate theatrical settings, and the people have been assured that they are the acme of legislative wisdom and sure panaceas for all the ills that afflict them, whether actual or imaginary. They are told not to worry any more, all is well. There is not anything really wrong. They only think so. For some perverse, occult, and sinister reason the people can not trace any beneficial results to these laws, but "hope springs eternal in the human breast"; "the future is before us," and all may be well.

This administration came into power upon a platform of promises to the American people, which it declared itself were to be kept and which its candidate declared was not "molasses to catch flies." It seemed to assume that, having so declared, it could disregard these promises ad libitum, and began its career by directly repudiating one of these promises at the dictation of the President. Platform promises have never in the history of political parties been so flagrantly repudiated or disregarded as during the past three years. The Democratic Party has treated its platform pledges as pledges not to be kept and as "molasses to catch flies." It did not have the nerve to declare in its 1916 platform that its pledges are to be kept, and you will not hear its candidate, if he is ever notified of his nomination, saying anything about "molasses to catch flies."

Let us take one declaration of party policy, one pledge that was not "molasses to catch flies," and see how performance squares with promise, and leave it to the people to decide whether a mere dictum shall be accepted as against affirmative action.

Party divisions are based upon principles and not upon spoils. The people want efficiency in government, rather than partisan success. They favor the merit system in government rather than "to the victor belongs the spoils." Knowing this, the Democratic Party declared in its platform of 1912:

> The laws pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party.

Have they kept this pledge? What action have they taken to comply with it. The first important act passed was the Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act of October 3, 1913. It imposed many new and unusual taxes, and made necessary the selection and appointment of many new employees. Was the civil-service law applied in the selection of such employees, to the end that "merit and ability" should be the standard of appointment rather than party service? Not at all. It was expressly provided in the act that—

> The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to appoint * * * all necessary officers, agents, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, messengers, and janitors.

Additional employees were needed in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington. Were they to be selected under the civil-service law? They could have been, and this would have been the proper course to take if the civil-service law was to be regarded. It was specially provided in the law, however, that—

> In the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, at Washington, D. C., there shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, one additional deputy commissioner, at a salary of $4,000 per annum; two heads of division, whose compensation shall not exceed $2,500 per annum, and such other clerks, messengers, and employees * * * as may be necessary: Provided, That for a period of two years from and after the passage of this act the force of agents, deputy collectors, inspectors, and other employees, not including the clerical force below the grade of chief of division employed in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, in the city of Washington, D. C., authorized by this section of this act shall be appointed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury to insure faithful and competent service, and with such compensation as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may fix, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, within the limits herein prescribed.

That was a positive legislative repudiation of the civil-service system as applicable to hundreds of employees to be appointed to carry out the revenue act. On a motion to strike out this proviso the yeas were 32—all Republicans—and the nays 37—all Democrats. On an amendment by Senator GALLINGER to require these employees to be selected under civil-service rules, yeas 32, nays 37.

A few days afterwards, to wit, October 22, 1913, there was approved an appropriation bill which contained a provision expressly repealing the civil-service law as applicable to deputy collectors of internal revenue and deputy marshals, who had been, pursuant to law, placed within the operation of the civil-service system. The urgent deficiency act, upon its first page, provided as follows:

Provided, That hereafter any deputy collector of internal revenue or deputy marshal who may be required by law or authority or direction of the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal to execute a bond to the collector of internal revenue or the United States marshal to secure faithful performance of official duty may be appointed by the said collector or marshal, who may require such bond, without regard to the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, and amendments thereto, or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof, and the officer requiring said bond shall have the power to revoke the appointment of any subordinate officer or employee and appoint his successor at his discretion without regard to the act, amendments, rules, or regulations aforesaid.

The pressure was too great, the spoils were too inviting. Efficiency of service must give way to the rewards of party loyalty, and these official positions that had been placed under the operation of the civil-service law in the interests of the people and of efficiency and economy were to be used under the authority of a special legislative provision as rewards for party service.

The Federal reserve act was approved August 15, 1914. Under its provisions many additional clerks and employees were required. Was their selection left to the efficiency system? Was the platform pledge observed? Not at all. The administration of this act must also be made subject to party rewards, and the Federal Reserve Board was given authority—

To employ such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, or other employees as may be deemed necessary to conduct the business of the board. All salaries and fees shall be fixed in advance by said board and shall be paid in the same manner as the salaries of the members of said board. All such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, and other employees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of the act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 403), and amendments thereto, or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the President from placing said employees in the classified service.

These various employees are not to be selected under the civil-service system, but immediately upon their appointment the President can classify them under the system. In filling the offices our Democratic friends are for the spoils; when the offices are filled they are for clinching their hold on the spoils by applying the merit system.

The act to create a Federal Trade Commission was approved September 26, 1915. It also created many additional offices, and its administration would require the appointment of many additional clerks and employees. The provision relating to its employees is a very peculiar one. It is hard to see just what is the intention with reference to the appointment of the employees necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. It provides:

The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable in like manner, and it shall have the authority to employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress.

This would seem to place the authority to employ clerks and other employees directly in the hands of the Federal Trade Commission without regard to the civil-service law. It is qualified to a certain extent by a provision that all employees of the commission excepting certain special ones shall enter the service under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commission and by the Civil Service Commission.

One thing is certain, the Federal Trade Commission will determine the rules and regulations under which these employees will enter the service, notwithstanding the act gives the Civil Service Commission some concurrent authority in the matter. The act is careful to provide, however, that the employees of the commission, after they get into the service, whether as a reward for party service or otherwise, "shall be a part of the classified civil service."

The act providing for a Federal Farm Loan Board, approved July 17, 1916, will require the employment of many clerical officers and other employees, and care was taken to eliminate the operation of the merit system in the appointment of these officials and to apply it after their appointment, in order, if possible, to insure the continuance of the reward given for party service.

This act provides:

The Federal Farm Loan Board shall be authorized and empowered to employ such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, laborers, and other employees as it may deem necessary to conduct the business of said board. All salaries and fees authorized in this section and not otherwise provided for shall be fixed in advance by said board and shall be paid in the same manner as the salaries of the Federal Farm Loan Board. All such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, laborers, and other employees, and all registrars, examiners, and appraisers shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of the act of January 16, 1883 (Vol. XXII, United States Statutes at Large, p. 403), and amendments thereto, or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the President from placing said employees in the classified service.

The shipping bill which has now passed and which will no doubt become a law authorizes the appointment of a shipping board and also necessitates the employment of several hundred clerks and other officials. No attention is paid either to the declaration of the platform of 1912 or the declaration in the platform of 1916, but it is provided that:

The board shall appoint a secretary, at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and employ and fix the compensation of such attorneys, officers, naval architects, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees as it may find necessary for the proper performance of its duties as may be appropriated for by the Congress.

After these appointments are made and these officials are inducted into office without regard to the civil service, it is expressly provided that all employees of the board, with certain exceptions, shall be "part of the classified civil service."

It was reported by the committee to the Senate, the Senate modified it by an amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and this amendment was accepted in the House, as were all the amendments made by the Senate to the shipping bill. If the bill had gone to conference there is not any doubt in my mind but that that provision would have been eliminated and it would have been reported here as it passed the House and as reported by the committee.

In the revenue act of this session, which has been reported to the Senate, an amendment has been inserted by the Senate committee reading as follows:

SEC. 47. For the expense connected with the assessment and collection of the taxes provided by this act there is hereby appropriated $100,000, or as much thereof as may be required, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the enforcement of the provisions of this act for duty in the District of Columbia, or any collection district of the United States, or any of the Territories thereof.

The amendment is the provision now pending before the Senate to which the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire has been offered.

No compliance with the civil-service law in this. It is a pure matter of party spoils. Appointment of the necessary officials, from officers to janitors, is left solely to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who will be strictly a party man.

Under the employees' compensation act a commission is provided, and, of course, additional employees will be necessary. Section 30, as it passed the House and was reported to the Senate, provided:

That the commission shall have such assistants, clerks, and other employees as may be from time to time provided by Congress. They shall be appointed in the same manner as appointments to the competitive classified civil-service positions.

This was changed in the Senate through an amendment offered by Senator Galliner expressly requiring these appointments to be made from the classified service and under civil-service rules. We are getting a little nearer election time, and our Democratic friends are not quite so bold in their legislative repudiation of the civil service. This provision may be accepted by the House, although if the bill should go to conference the provision will very likely be eliminated.

So hungry have our Democratic friends been that special positions have not been exempt from their attacks. The Commissioner of the Five Civilized Tribes was manipulated so as to make it a politically appointive office, as was the commissioner of immigration at New Orleans. The effort to have the commercial attachés provided for the Department of Commerce in the interest of our foreign commerce selected under the merit system was stoutly and effectively resisted by the Democrats, and these positions were left to political influence. These are a few of the minor instances showing the attitude of the party in power toward the civil-service system to which they so vehemently protest their devotion but which they wholly disregard.

In view of this record, the declaration in the Democratic platform of 1916 that "We reaffirm our declaration for the rigid enforcement of the civil-service law" is a choice bit of satire. They should have added to this declaration "And we point with pride to our record of strict adherence to the civil-service laws and principles as exemplifying the meaning of the declaration which we hereby reaffirm."

Several attempts have been made to further destroy the civil service. One in particular should be noticed. The Post Office Department is the greatest governmental agency in existence. It touches all of the people very intimately. Its efficient and economic administration is of the highest concern. Assistant postmasters had been placed in the classified service in the interest of economy and efficiency. One of the first attempts made by this administration was to take them, together with the other local post-office employees, out of the civil service and make their positions the prey of partisanship.

August 7, 1914, House bill 17042, "A bill to amend the postal and civil-service laws, and for other purposes," was under consideration in the House. The following amendment was proposed by Mr. CULLOP, of Indiana:

That hereafter any assistant postmaster, clerk, or employee in any post office who may be required by law or by authority or direction of the Postmaster General to give a bond to the United States to secure faithful performance of official duty may be required also to execute a bond to the postmaster whose assistant, clerk, or employee he is, for the faithful performance of his duties as such, in the discretion of the Postmaster General. The postmaster of all such offices shall have the power to select his assistant postmaster, all clerks, and employees irrespective of any civil-service law to the contrary, and all laws, regulations, and orders in conflict with this act are hereby repealed and nullified: Provided, That all such appointments shall be for a period of four years.

Under this amendment not only assistant postmasters would be taken out of the civil service but all local post-office clerks and other employees would be excluded from the operation of the civil-service laws and made the prey of party politics. This amendment was adopted in the Committee of the Whole, where no record is made showing how each individual voted, by a vote of 75 yeas to 25 nays. When the amendment came to a record vote and each Representative was compelled to go on record, the amendment was defeated by a vote of 162 nays to 81 yeas, but it is significant of the attitude of the Democratic Party that every one of the 81 yeas was a Democrat.

Further attempts have been made to exclude assistant postmasters from the operation of the civil service. The Postmaster General recommended the abolishment of the office, and the substitution for it of a superintendent of finance. An attempt was made to carry out this recommendation, and it was in the Post Office appropriation bill as it came over to the Senate a year or two ago. The Senate would not stand for it. It was stricken out of the bill. Although again recommended by the Postmaster General, our Democratic friends have not dared to press the matter further.

I do not know what has been done in an administrative way to nullify and undermine the civil-service system. I have simply pointed out what is disclosed by the record and can not be disputed. When such open and drastic legislative action has been taken, it is safe to conclude that everything possible has been done in an administrative way to put the "faithful" in and the experienced and efficient out.

Explanations will be made and reasons will be given in excuse of what has been done. The people will know, however, that the civil-service pledge has been and is shown to be "molasses to catch flies."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to say, with reference to the amendment which the Senator offered to the ship-purchase bill, which he claims would have brought those employees under the civil service, the bill as it came from the other House provided that they should be appointed from the classified service. I do not think the Senator's amendment added very much to that. At any rate, it is in the law, I take it, because the bill was agreed to by the House as it went from the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the committee. Does the Senator ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; let the vote be taken viva voce.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the section to which the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire applies at all interferes with the civil-service status of any of the officials mentioned in his amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I think it does, and I want to suggest to the Senator at this point that I have another amendment, which has been printed, to come in on page 135, in lines 20 and 21; but it strikes me that $100,000 is appropriated in this provision to pay these subordinate officers. I do not know what else it is for.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, you will have to pay men under the civil service as well as pay men outside of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; and that is precisely what I want to do. I want to get the eligible lists made shorter, rather than longer, in the Civil Service Commission. They are now holding examinations all over the country, and a large number of eligibles will come to that commission to be placed on the list. Unless they are to be appointed to these places under the laws which we are passing, it is utterly idle for the Civil Service Commission to put these young men and young women to the trouble and expense of taking the examinations.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I have said, Mr. President. My statement to the Senate was to the effect that there is nothing in this bill which provides that any additional force which may be required to carry out its provisions would be taken from under the civil service. We have a general law, expressly declaring what positions shall be covered under the civil service. The positions mentioned in the bill are all positions that are now under the civil service. The bill simply provides for the appointment of the officials by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but those appointments will have to be made according to the present law, and the present law places under the civil service all of the positions mentioned in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree with my friend from North Carolina. This provision expressly says that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is authorized to appoint and to fix the compensation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly, Mr. President; but he appoints them under existing law; he appoints them from the civil service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think so at all. If that were so, he would not have to fix the compensation. The law fixes the compensation for clerks in the various classes.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the law does not always fix the compensation of clerks, messengers, and janitors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, there is a statutory law covering all of that; and the Senator from North Carolina must know it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think not always.

Mr. GALLINGER. If these men are to be appointed from the civil service, what harm would it do to say so?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that we ought to deal frankly with each other about this matter. In the committee and in the conference the question was considered, and there was no disposition whatsoever, either in the one body or in the other, to take these officials out from under the civil service. In fact, my recollection is—and I will ask the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], who looks especially after these matters, to correct me if I am wrong—that some Senator offered an amendment providing that these officials should not be under the civil service—it was either in the committee or in the caucus—and that proposition was voted down.

It was not our purpose to take these officials out from under the civil service. We did not think this provision of the act did take them out of the civil service. I think it is but fair that I should make this statement to the Senate. I do not myself think there is any doubt about it. It is clear to my mind that the appointment here authorized is an appointment to be made by the commissioner of these people from the eligible list.

Mr. GALLINGER. But it does not say so.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is to say, it does not make any difference whether the particular official is under the civil service or not; the appointment has to be made. If it is not under the civil service he is appointed from the general body of the people. If it is under the civil service he is appointed from an eligible list of three, which is certified by the Civil Service Commission; but in either event it is an appointment, and somebody must be given the power to make that appointment. We gave the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the power to make it; he has the power now to make all appointments in his office, whether they are under the civil service or not under the civil service. He is simply governed by one rule in one case and by a different rule in the other case. Our understanding of this was that we simply gave him authority to make these appointments, and the appointments will be made from the eligible lists as in other cases of appointments of clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees in the departments.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will not argue that in sundry bills which were passed—and I will state that they were passed before my attention was called to the matter—for instance, the income-tax law, those appointments were to be made from the classified lists of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Colorado desires to make a statement in reference to the pending matter.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has informed me of certain action that was taken concerning this identical subject, which I had forgotten. In view of that the committee will accept the amendment to the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say in accepting the amendment to the amendment that it was our view—and it is my view now—that it is not necessary. But if there is any doubt about it, or if Senators think there is any doubt about it, as it is our purpose not to except employees under this bill from the civil service, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina before he leaves the Chamber that unless that amendment is kept in the bill in conference the employees here authorized can be selected from anywhere in the United States. They must be put under the civil service by the law itself or else the appointing power—in this case the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—can select the men from anywhere outside of the civil service.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, the Senator contends that if we have a general law providing that a certain force shall be under the civil service and it becomes necessary by virtue of the fact that a bill is passed requiring additional men to be employed we will have to provide that the additional men shall also be appointed from the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble is that the law does not provide that hereafter all employees shall be under the civil service. Each branch of the service is put under the civil service by law, and there is no employee who falls under the civil-service law unless the law authorizing the appointment or some future law places him under the civil service.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, let me ask the Senator another question. If the general law puts messengers under the civil service, and by virtue of legislation it becomes necessary to appoint more messengers, do we have to pass another law putting those additional messengers under the civil service?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, messengers and certain other employees are provided for at a certain rate by statute. Among these are clerks of class 1, clerks of class 2, clerks of class 3, and clerks of class 4, and the salaries paid to the clerks in each one of those classes is fixed by law. So it is with laborers, watchmen, and messengers; but the employees provided for in this bill are merely designated as clerks, messengers, and so forth, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act; and the bill does not require that they shall be taken from the civil-service lists unless we so provide at the time we appropriate for the payment of their services.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, without continuing the discussion with the Senator, all I care to say about it now is that it was our purpose that these employees should be under the civil service, and we believed that we had put them under the civil service; but if there is any doubt about it, we accept the amendment.

Now, let me say, in addition, that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] stated here this morning that if the shipping bill had gone to conference he had no doubt in the world that the provision in that bill which required employees under it to be taken from the civil service would have been stricken out. Why the Senator should make that statement upon the floor of the Senate, in view of the fact that the amendment putting them under the civil service was accepted by the committee when it was offered here, and was supported by the Democrats, I can not understand.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator why I made the statement. I made it simply because of the previous record of his party in this respect, as I have shown it to be. I have not a doubt that the Senate conferees would have stood for the proposition put in the Senate bill with a reasonable degree of pertinacity; but I expressed it as my opinion that I had no doubt the bill would have come back here with the Senate amendment stricken out and the provision kept in as it passed the House. Of course that is only my opinion, based upon the record made by this Congress with reference to civil-service matters under this administration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, the Senator said that he had absolutely no doubt about it. Now, what reason has the Senator for thinking that the Democrats in the House would have taken a different course or would have felt differently with respect to this matter than the Democrats of the Senate, representing the Democratic Party in this body, took or felt?

Mr. JONES. I take it that the House conferees would have felt disposed to stand by the House provision, because it had been adopted by the House, and I think they would have stood by it all the more pertinaciously because they were in favor of it and because the record shows that that would have very likely been the outcome. Of course the Senator may not agree with me; it is a matter of opinion between us; but I base my opinion upon the record of his party.

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon the same basis of reasoning and by the same parity of reasoning the Senator could say with equal propriety that he had no doubt that every amendment made by the Senate to the House bill would have been stricken out in conference.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; I can not agree to that suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator at this moment that the shipping bill as it came from the House expressly provided—and even if the conferees had given up the Senate amendment, they would have gone back to the House provision—that "all employees of the board shall be a part of the classified civil service."

Mr. JONES. Is the Senator from Florida referring to the shipping bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that provision was in the shipping bill as it came to the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Yes; it provided that the employees should be appointed without regard to the civil service, but that immediately after they were appointed they should come under it. That is what that provision meant, and that is all it meant.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not see for the life of me but that the bill expressly covered the contention which Senators on the other side are now making.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is altogether wrong in his contention, and, although I am not going to enter into a controversy with him about it, I disagree with him as to one of the statements made by him. When a messenger is appointed the general law fixes his salary and provides that he shall be under the civil service. So it is with janitors and with clerks. If a $1,200 clerk is appointed, he must be appointed in accordance with civil-service requirements. The only way to get around the civil-service law is to enact a provision that the civil-service law shall not apply in a particular case, as has been done sometimes heretofore. However, I rose more particularly to ask the Senator from New Hampshire—I have not heard his amendment read—whether his amendment would put deputy collectors, who are not under the civil service, in the civil service?

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not touch them at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, that is all right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again stated. I was a little late in getting into the Chamber and did not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to hear it, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 83, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

> All appointments of officers, clerks, messengers, janitors, and other necessary employees shall be made from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. I do not desire to get into a controversy over this matter; but, as I have said, I offered a similar amendment to the shipping bill and to the workmen's compensation bill. Looking at the RECORD, it appears that the conferees agreed to the Senate amendment in the case of the workmen's compensation bill, and that in the case of the shipping bill, that bill not having gone to conference, the amendments of the Senate were agreed to by the other House en bloc.

I notice in connection with these bills—and, of course, different persons draft them—that differing phraseology is employed. For instance, when the shipping bill was under consideration it was argued that the provision in that bill was a civil-service provision. Now, let us see how it read:

> All employees of the board shall be a part of the classified civil service.

That is to say, the board would appoint them outside of the civil service, and automatically they would go into the civil service without examination.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be a correct interpretation of that provision that until the employees were put into the civil service they could not be appointed, and would it not mean that they would have to be in it all the time, and therefore have to come from it?

Mr. GALLINGER. They would be put under the civil service in about five minutes after they were employed under that provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the shipping board could have appointed a man who was not under the civil service.

Mr. GALLINGER. However, I offered a similar amendment to that bill, which was agreed to, and it is part of the law; and I do not think there is going to be any serious objection to my amendment in this instance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as this discussion has arisen regarding the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I want to call attention to the fact that the civil service, so called, is in some respects fulfilling some of the apprehensions expressed regarding the system at the time of and before its adoption. The vast body of employees of the Government now holding their positions under what is called the civil service are an organized body of men and women. I do not know how many they number, but several hundred thousand at the present time.

I recall that at the time the subject was agitated the fear was expressed that permanent tenure of service would create what was then called an aristocracy of officeholders. It certainly has created an organization of officeholders that is becoming sufficiently strong to dictate legislation to the Congress of the United States, and bids fair to be one of those organizations before whose demands we are in times of crisis expected to yield, or, at least, to act with that expedition which is incompatible with mature deliberation.

I am not opposed to the civil service. I have been at one time quite an advocate of the system; but it seems to me that certain conditions affecting this service are becoming somewhat sinister in their manifestations, and that in the near future it might perhaps be well, if not necessary, to enact some further legislation with regard to the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 48. No person employed by the United States shall communicate, or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto, any information obtained under the provisions of this title, or allow any such person to inspect or have access to any return furnished under the provisions of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 13, to insert:

SEC. 49. Whoever violates any of the provisions of this title or the regulations made thereunder, or who fails or refuses to make the return required, or who knowingly makes false statement in any return, or refuses to give such information as may be called for, is guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall, in addition to paying any tax to which he is liable, be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 22, to insert:

SEC. 50. All administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment and collection of taxes not specifically repealed, are hereby made to apply to this title so far as applicable and not inconsistent with its provisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 51. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, and may require any corporations subject to such provisions to furnish him with further information whenever in his judgment the same is necessary to collect the tax provided for herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I understood a reservation was made in one part of this subdivision of the bill by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No reservation was made in regard to this subdivision, as the Chair understands.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning with line 6, page 106.

The next amendment was, on page 106, line 6, after the words "rate of," to strike out "3" and insert "8," so as to make the clause read:

Manufacturers of cigarettes, including little cigars weighing not more than 3 pounds per thousand shall each pay at the rate of 8 cents for every 10,000 cigarettes, or fraction thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 106, after line 21, to insert:

SEC. 58. That section 2804 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 26 of the act of August 28, 1894, be further amended, and section 3402 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2804. No cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes shall be imported unless the same are packed in boxes of not more than 500 in each box, and all cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes on importation shall be placed in public store or bonded warehouse, and shall not be removed therefrom until the same shall have been inspected and a stamp affixed to each box indicating such inspection: Provided, That cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes imported by mail or parcel post may be inspected and stamped without removing to public store or bonded warehouse. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to provide the requisite stamps and to make all necessary regulations for carrying the above provisions of law into effect.

"SEC. 3402. All cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes imported from foreign countries shall pay, in addition to the import duties imposed thereon, the tax prescribed by law for cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes manufactured in the United States, and shall have the same stamps affixed. The stamps shall be affixed and canceled by the owner or importer of the cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes while they are in the custody of the proper customhouse officers, and the cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes shall not pass out of the custody of such officers until the stamps have been so affixed and canceled, but shall be put up in boxes containing quantities as prescribed in this chapter for cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes manufactured in the United States. Whenever it is necessary to take any cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes so imported to any place other than the public stores of the United States for the purpose of affixing and canceling such stamps the collector of customs of the port where such cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes are entered shall designate a bonded warehouse to which they shall be taken under the control of such customs officer as such collector may direct. And every officer of customs who permits any such cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes to pass out of his custody or control without compliance by the owner or importer thereof with the provisions of this section relating thereto shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years: Provided, That cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes brought into the United States by mail or parcel post may be inspected, stamped, and delivered to the owner or importer thereof without removing to public stores or bonded warehouses under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to strongly object to the adoption of that amendment offered by the committee. It is entirely a new proposition. The objections which I make to it are based mainly upon two grounds:

First, if put into effect, such a law would very seriously detract from and injure the great tobacco industry of this country. It is an industry from which the Treasury of the United States derives revenue in the way of customs duties and internal-revenue tax to the amount of $110,000,000 annually. It is an important industry in my own State. Shade-grown tobacco is now being developed to an extent where it is an important competitor of Sumatra wrapper. The cigar-manufacturing industry of Tampa is a very important one.

The annual output in manufactured cigars amounts in value to something like twelve and a half million dollars. There are manufactured in Tampa and West Tampa together over 250,000,000 cigars annually. There is paid for internal-revenue stamps at that office an amount exceeding $900,000 annually. The customs duties paid in Tampa amount to over $2,000,000 per annum. Key West is another large manufacturing center.

This provision, if it should become law, would have the effect of advancing the interests of manufacturers in Cuba to the great detriment and injury of manufacturers in this country; and there is no need now of facilitating that competition by enabling the Cuban manufacturer to lay on the desks of consumers in this country cigars by the box, 50 or 100, as the case may be. There is a sort of feeling that the Cuban cigar is of superior quality, and Cuba has a well-deserved reputation for producing the finest tobacco grown in the world for the manufacture of cigars. But Cuba also produces poor tobacco, and Cuban manufacturers also manufacture sorry cigars. The consumer in this country, however, basing his choice upon the reputation of Cuba, would be prompted to order his cigars from Cuba instead of from the manufacturer in the United States if he obtained them at something like the same price, and consequently that trade would drift away from our own manufacturers to the Cuban manufacturers.

The injury would be felt also by the middlemen, the clubs, and other agencies of distribution in the United States. It would mean an enormous sacrifice on the part of our own industries for the benefit of foreign manufacturers. That sacrifice is not called for to-day. Cuba was never more prosperous. Both her sugar industry and her tobacco industry are flourishing as perhaps never before in her history. There is no call for any extension of benevolence or philanthropy on our part to Cuba just at this time, and this provision would have the sole effect of advantaging competitors in our own industry, those competitors being in foreign countries. Cuba already has the great advantage of a 20 per cent reduction on tariff duties. That law or convention it may be worth while to look into to see whether or not it should be continued, but it is an advantage to Cuba, and it seems to me we are not at this time called upon to extend additional advantages to our competitors in that country.

The next proposition is that the provision will not raise one dollar of additional revenue. This is a revenue bill. It is not a bill proposing general legislation for promoting the parcel post or extending it or opening the way for parcel-post conventions with other countries. This provision will not add one cent to the revenue if it should become the law of the land, and therefore it has no place in this bill. As I have said, this is a revenue bill. We are attempting here to raise the revenue which we need and require; but this provision does not raise one dollar of revenue, and therefore I contend that upon that ground it ought not to be adopted.

I understand, Mr. President, that the proposal was submitted to the House committee, and that that committee practically unanimously determined against it. My conviction is that if the Senate should agree to this amendment it would not be held in agreement in conference. I have every reason to believe that the House conferees will stand by their previous determination, and that this provision, even if agreed to in the Senate, would go out in conference. For that reason I am not going to elaborate upon the arguments which might be made against it. I have a firm faith that the House will stand by its position with reference to this proposal, and that this amendment could not be agreed to in conference, even though the Senate should adopt it. Therefore I am not going to take the time of the Senate with further discussion of it, relying upon that faith and that conviction.

I wish, however, Mr. President, to have inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks some letters and telegrams and communications which I have had upon this subject by way of strengthening the arguments which the conferees of the Senate and of the House will have before them when this matter is considered, should it be agreed to in the Senate. I ask to have this material inserted without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not for one moment think of consenting to this proposed amendment, and I strongly object to it upon the grounds which are set forth in the communications and telegrams which I submit, and for the reasons which I have briefly outlined.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TAMPA, FLA., August 24, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have noticed with interest the amendment to section 58 of the revenue bill, as reported by the Senate committee, tending to facilitate the transportation of cigars by mail or parcel post direct from the Cuban manufacturers to the consumers in the United States, and we feel that this measure, if successful of passage, would be a direct blow at the Clear Havana cigar industry in the United States. With the importation of foreign cigars especially from Porto Rico and other countries which heretofore had no market in this country, it became necessary to revive the Clear Havana cigar industry in this country, and to that end the law authorizing the manufacture of cigars in bond was principally directed. We, as well as the vast majority of the Clear Havana cigar manufacturers of this country have at a great expense complied with the provisions of that law and are now manufacturing cigars in bond, and we feel that the passage of such an amendment would cause serious loss to the cigar industry of this country, besides accomplishing no good to the citizens thereof. We feel that the protection of home industry is paramount to the creating of benefits to foreign countries, and we believe that you will realize this and defeat the proposed amendment.

Assuring you of our appreciation of any efforts that you may make in our behalf, we beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,
SAN MARTIN & LEON CO.,

TAMPA, FLA., August 24, 1916.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wired you last night as per inclosed copy.

There is no doubt in our mind but that, if section 58 of the revenue bill, as reported by Senate Finance Committee, is made a law, embodying the amendment that would tend to facilitate direct mail-order business between manufacturers of cigars in Cuba and consumers in the United States, the whole cigar industry of this country would suffer greatly. This would not only affect manufacturers but would be felt by jobbers and dealers alike.

The Clear Havana industry is the backbone of Tampa, and we feel sure you will bend every effort in behalf of the interest of the manufacturers and your people at large.

Yours, truly,
CUESTA, REY & CO.

We urgently call your attention to section 58 of revenue bill reported by Senate Finance Committee and wish to emphatically protest the amendment therein that would tend to facilitate direct mail-order business between cigar manufacturers in Cuba and consumers in the United States. Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,

Please give your attention section 58 revenue bill, as reported by Senate Finance Committee. We protest emphatically against that section which would tend to allow Cuban manufacturers to do a mail-order business in cigars with consumers in the United States. Such legislation will curtail and severely hurt the great Havana cigar industry established in this city. Please use your efforts for the protection of our manufacturers, which means, of course, our city.

TAMPA BOARD OF TRADE.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., August 23, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

We beg your distinguished consideration and earnest efforts to defeat section 58 of the revenue bill, as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance, which contains an amendment tending to facilitate the transportation of cigars by mail or parcel post direct from the Cuban manufacturer to the consumer in the United States. In our judgment this would be seriously detrimental and demoralizing to home industry. It would eliminate the middleman and create unfair competition against United States manufacturers. As large taxpayers of customs duties and internal revenue, we protest this measure and trust you will steadfastly oppose it.

NEW YORK, August 22, 1916.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senator, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER:

* * * * * * * *

Pardon me for taking the liberty of addressing you now in regard to a particular provision of the revenue bill now pending in the Senate, which, although perhaps perfectly harmless on its face, may nevertheless have a wide and far-reaching effect upon the cigar industry in this country and particularly the cigar industry in the State of Florida, and may also lead to incalculable injury, not only to the cigar-manufacturing industry, but to the importing and the retail branches of the industry as well.

I refer to section 58 of the bill as reported by the Senate committee, which section contains amendments to sections 2804 and 3402 of the Revised Statutes.

We do not know at whose solicitation or upon whose request this amendment has been inserted in the bill. It appears that the same provisions were embodied in a bill recently introduced in the Senate by Senator RANSDELL, of Louisiana, that said bill was referred to the Committee on Finance, and we now find these new provisions in the revenue bill as reported by the committee under section 58.

By the proposed amendment the existing statute was changed by eliminating the minimum quantity of cigars that may be imported, which is 3,000, so that under the proposed act cigars may be imported in any quantity and by inserting a new provision tending to facilitate the importation of cigars by mail or parcel post, thus opening up the parcel post and post-office channels of distribution for cigar manufacturers in Cuba.

As already stated, we do not know at whose solicitation or upon whose request the Committee on Finance has undertaken to facilitate the opening up of a mail-order business for Cuban cigars. Surely no American cigar manufacturer could have made such suggestion and certainly no importer or retailer of imported cigars could have asked the Government of the United States to place its Post Office Department and its parcel-post machinery at the disposal of cigar manufacturers in a foreign country to the end that American importers and American retailers might be driven out of business.

We respectfully submit that the proposed amendment is indefensible; it can not possibly result in any good to the country, but on the contrary, it may lead to the extermination of American cigar importers, besides that it may work incalculable injury to the thousands of retailers, clubs, drug stores, and hotel stands selling imported cigars.

Moreover, opening up the post office and parcel post avenues for the transportation of Cuban cigars direct from the manufacturer to the consumer and you will at the same time provide unlimited facilities for defrauding the American consumer, for surely there will soon spring into existence in Cuba a great many unscrupulous manufacturers producing cheap grades of cigars and advertising them in this country as the real Cuban article, whereas, as a matter of fact, the consumer would be getting a cheap article such as he can buy in American stores at a nickel or so on, for which he would pay a fancy price because it is a cigar made in Cuba and known as a Cuban cigar.

Such law would be particularly hurtful to the cigar industry in Florida, because the Florida cigars, as you well know, are next in quality and type to Cuban-made cigars, and such competition on the part of Cuban manufacturers by the mail-order system will undoubtedly hurt the Florida cigar industry to a serious extent.

We appeal to you, therefore, that you oppose the amendment referred to and that you take such steps as you may deem advisable to secure the elimination of that amendment from the revenue bill.

Thanking you in advance and assuring you of our highest appreciation of whatever you may do in the interest of the American cigar industry, we are,

Respectfully, yours,

TOBACCO MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
By CHAS. DUSHKIND, Secretary.

A PROTEST AGAINST SECTION 58 OF THE OMNIBUS REVEUNE BILL, PROVIDING FOR THE INDISCRIMINATE SHIPMENT INTO THE UNITED STATES OF FOREIGN CIGARS, CIGARETTES, AND CHEROOTS BY PARCEL POST.

[Joseph F. Cullman, jr., New York, president; W. J. Lukaswitz, Dayton, Ohio, vice president; George M. Berger, Cincinnati, Ohio, treasurer; Joseph Mendelsohn, secretary, 196 Water Street, New York.]

THE NATIONAL CIGAR LEAF TOBACCO ASSOCIATION,
New York, August 16, 1916.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Senate Finance Committee, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Protesting on behalf of the National Cigar Leaf Tobacco Association against the enactment of the provision of the omnibus revenue bill (sec. 58, p. 106, of the bill as reported to the Senate) permitting the importation of cigars by parcel post in any quantity up to 500, instead of in packages of not less than 3,000, as required by existing law, we desire most earnestly to call your attention to the following considerations:

The existing statute prescribing that cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots shall not be imported into the United States in packages of less than 3,000 each is most salutary and has been a very efficient safeguard to the revenues. The limitation results in the importation of these goods in recognized commercial quantities which are entered at ports where they can be examined by experts in tobacco values, which are the most difficult to ascertain of any that are embraced in the tariff law. Inasmuch as cigars pay a compound duty of $4.50 per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem, less the reciprocity deduction of 20 per cent in the case of Cuban goods, it follows that, as to the average Cuban cigar, the ad valorem duty is likely to amount to about $20 per thousand, the exact appraisement depending upon the up-to-date technical knowledge of Habana cigars possessed by the examiner. The importance, therefore, of the examination of imported cigars at the leading ports of entry, where expert examiners are stationed, is clearly apparent and is a consideration of vast consequence to the national revenues, to say nothing of the interest of the domestic manufacturer and his employees in the prevention of undervaluation.

The amendment embodied in section 58 of the revenue bill specifically permits the importation of cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots in any quantity up to 500 and prescribes the manner in which they may be shipped into the United States by parcel post, exempting them from the requirement that they shall be placed in public store or bonded warehouse for inspection and stamping and enabling them to be entered at any one of no less than 24 ports of entry, at very few of which the Treasury Department maintains examiners with any expert knowledge concerning cigars or tobacco. The danger to the revenues of such an innovation can hardly be exaggerated.

The object of this amendment is well known to the entire cigar trade of the United States, being the basis of a movement set on foot more than three years ago in the island of Cuba by the Habana cigar manufacturers to force an entry into the cigar market of the United States through the adoption of mail-order methods. An attempt by the Postmaster General of the United States to negotiate a parcel-post treaty with Cuba was met by the Cuban Government with a demand that the customs laws of the United States regarding the size of packages of cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots admissible to importation should be amended so as to permit the indiscriminate shipment by mail of these products to all parts of the United States. The officials of the Post Office Department, doubtless not being advised as to the effect of such an amendment, recommended it to the Ways and Means Committee and also secured the cooperation of the Treasury Department, the officials of which appear to have yielded to the representations made by the Postmaster General concerning the desirability of negotiating a parcel-post treaty. The committee, however, did not act upon the bill.

It will be noted, therefore, that section 58 is simply and solely a valuable concession to the Cuban cigar manufacturers at the expense of the revenues of the United States and of the welfare of that branch of the American cigar industry engaged in making high-grade cigars from Cuban leaf tobacco, a branch that employs the most highly paid class of labor and affords employment which it is the ambition of every American cigar maker to obtain. This concession is sought by the Cuban manufacturer at a time when he is already enjoying a reduction of 20 per cent in the rates of the United States tariff on cigars pursuant to the reciprocity arrangement of December 17, 1903. Under this reciprocity treaty the people of Cuba have already received, practically as a free gift from the United States Treasury, $167,040,000 up to July 1, 1916, a huge sum taken out of the Treasury in the name of a one-sided reciprocal trade arrangement that has been of vastly greater value to Cuba than to the United States.

We would especially emphasize the condition of the clear Habana branch of the American cigar industry at the present time. This division of our trade has been subjected to every conceivable disturbing influence during the past 18 years and for an even longer period it has been injuriously influenced by the differential rates of duty on leaf tobacco, which, as construed by the courts, make it impossible for a manufacturer who imports his tobacco to figure in advance what he will pay in duties, and frequently compels him to pay the full wrapper rate of $1.85 per pound less 20 per cent on whole bales of leaf, which the Government examiners admit contain but 16 or 17 per cent of wrappers, the remainder being fillers dutiable, according to the letter of the statute, at 35 cents per pound less 20 per cent. The agitation for the free admission of Philippine tobacco products also affected the clear Habana trade adversely, and numerous commercial developments have served to stunt its growth. As a result of the combination of detrimental influences affecting this trade the volume of its output has declined during the past few years fully 60 per cent, and we do not hesitate to predict that if section 58 of the omnibus revenue bill is enacted into law the remnant of the clear Habana industry will disappear within a very short time.

We are confident that with the facts herein stated before you, you will feel it to be your duty to eliminate the section referred to from the pending measure.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. FOX,
Chairman Legislative Committee.
W. L. CROUNSE,
Washington Representative National Cigar Leaf Tobacco Association.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I fully concur with what the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] has so ably and clearly stated. This amendment ought not to stay in the bill. It is simply an effort to create a business in Cuba by parcel post to the detriment of cigar making in this country; and this is not the proper place for this matter to be discussed. As it is a postal matter, it ought to go to the Post Office Committee, anyway.

I hope the committee will consent to let this amendment go out. There is no way of estimating the tax. There is no way of making any classification of the cigars when they come in. There is a liability to fraud, and I do hope the committee will consent to let this go out.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the only interest I have in this amendment is the duty which has been imposed upon me by the committee to present the subject for the consideration of the Senate. Before doing so I wish to protest against what seems to be the occasional method of discussion in this body with regard to what the House committee of conference may do concerning the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. President, it is our duty to legislate according to the best of our information and judgment for the common benefit of the country, and this without regard to what may be the ultimate decision of a committee of conference between the two Houses. If we are to be deterred in considering legislation, whether important or not, from taking such action as in our judgment should be taken because those who are to compose the House committee of conference have seen fit to express in advance their determination as to what their action as conference committeemen will be, then it were better that we accept House legislation as it comes to us, whether we approve of it or not, upon the assumption that it is the best that we can obtain, and that the exercise of our own judgment with regard to amendments will be without avail.

Mr. President, I think the Members of the House have no more right to express themselves in this way regarding proposed legislation by this body than Members of the Senate have to express themselves with regard to the action of the House of Representatives regarding legislation proposed there.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator evidently misunderstood my comment. I said that this proposal had been made to the House committee when the bill was being considered there and was rejected by the House committee, and I have a notion that they will continue in that opposition. I have not made a reference to any discussion of the matter since the bill was passed by the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I had not the Senator from Florida in mind so much as I have some other expressions not made upon the floor in regard to the same subject and evidently based upon first-hand information affecting other amendments, not the one which is now under consideration. My remark, therefore, was general and in no sense a reflection upon the expression of the Senator from Florida. The statement which he made, however, emphasized it to my mind to such an extent that I determined to take this occasion to refer to it.

The amendment proposed was asked by the Department of the Treasury and by the Post Office Department. They have for some years been endeavoring to effect this legislation, and they have communicated their desire in correspondence to the committees which, perhaps, express or contain the reasons for the desired legislation as concisely, and certainly as clearly, as I could by any expression of my own. I therefore, with the permission of the Chair, will read the correspondence relating to this subject. I will not read the letters in chronological order because I do not think it necessary for a clear understanding of their substance.

The first letter is dated July 11, 1916, from the Postmaster General to Hon. F. M. SIMMONS, chairman of the Committee on Finance:

JULY 11, 1916.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: The Treasury Department and this department have united in recommending the amendment of sections 2804 and 3402 of the Revised Statutes as indicated in my letter of the 21st of September, 1914, addressed to Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD, then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a copy of which was handed to you on the 5th instant by the superintendent of foreign mails.

I am deeply interested in the proposed legislation, for the reasons set forth in my letter above mentioned, and would be pleased if it could be accomplished by the insertion of appropriate sections in the general revenue bill now pending, early action being desired in order to remove what is believed to be the only obstruction to the conclusion of a parcel-post convention with Cuba, which would be an important factor in the promotion of our foreign trade.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

SEPTEMBER 21, 1914.

Hon. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. UNDERWOOD: In furtherance of previous representations made by the joint letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General of February 24, 1913, and of my letter of September 11, 1914, I hand you herewith drafts of suggested legislation for the amendment of Revised Statutes, sections 2804 and 3402. Revised Statutes, section 2804, limits the importation of cigars to a quantity of 3,000 in a single package. The provision as it now stands reads as follows:

"SEC. 2804. No cigars shall be imported unless the same are packed in boxes of not more than 500 cigars in each box; and no entry of any imported cigars shall be allowed of less quantity than 3,000 in a single package; and all cigars on importation shall be placed in public store or bonded warehouse, and shall not be removed therefrom until the same shall have been inspected and a stamp affixed to each box indicating such inspection, and also a serial number, to be recorded in the customhouse. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to provide the requisite stamps and to make all necessary regulations for carrying the above provisions of law into effect."

The effect of the suggested amendment is to eliminate therefrom the limitation of 3,000 cigars in a single package and to do away with the necessity of a serial number of the stamps affixed to imported cigars, etc., being recorded in the customhouse.

Revised Statutes, section 3402, as it now stands reads as follows:

"SEC. 3402. All cigars imported from foreign countries shall pay, in addition to the import duties imposed thereon, the tax prescribed by law for cigars manufactured in the United States, and shall have the same stamps affixed. The stamps shall be affixed and canceled by the owner or importer of the cigars while they are in the custody of the proper customhouse officers, and the cigars shall not pass out of the custody of such officers until the stamps have been so affixed and canceled, but shall be put up in boxes containing quantities as prescribed in this chapter for cigars manufactured in the United States before the stamps are affixed. And the owner or importer of such cigars shall be liable to all the penal provisions of this title prescribed for manufacture of cigars manufactured in the United States. Whenever it is necessary to take any cigars so imported to any place other than the public stores of the United States for the purpose of affixing and canceling such stamps the collector of customs of the port where such cigars are entered shall designate a bonded warehouse to which they shall be taken, under the control of such customs officer as such collector may direct. And every officer of customs who permits any such cigars to pass out of his custody or control without compliance by the owner or importer thereof with the provisions of this section relating thereto shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than three years."

The effect of the proposed amendment is the addition to the law as it now stands of a proviso which will permit internal-revenue stamps to be affixed by customs officers or post-office officials authorized to deliver packages.

The purpose of this suggested legislation is to remove the restrictive limitations in the law as it now stands which prevent the negotiation of a parcel-post convention with Cuba, because the weight of a package of 3,000 cigars exceeds the weight limit prescribed by parcel-post conventions which are negotiated by this country with foreign countries, and therefore could not be imported into this country under the terms of such convention. For this reason the Cuban administration will not favorably consider further negotiations. With this limitation removed it is believed that there are no further obstacles to the negotiations to such convention, which would open the Cuban market to our merchants to the great advantage of our export trade. The amendment to section 3402 consists in the addition of the proviso which facilitates the delivery of the articles. These amendments have received the approval of the Treasury Department as well as this department, and it is hoped that early action may be obtained.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

The next letter is from the Treasury Department, dated August 18, 1916, to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and is as follows:

AUGUST 18, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to refer to Senate bill No. 6825, "A bill to amend sections 2804 and 3402 of the Revised Statutes," which was introduced under date of the 10th instant and referred to your committee.

The purport of this bill is to repeal that portion of the said section 2804 which provides that "no entry of any imported cigars shall be allowed of less quantity than 3,000 in a single package," and to make provision for the inspection by customs officers of cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes imported by mail or parcel post, and the affixing of the necessary customs-inspection and internal-revenue stamps thereof without placing them in public store or in a designated bonded warehouse to remain until inspected, weighed, and stamped, as now required, and to amend the said section 3402 so as to make the law applicable to cheroots and cigarettes as well as cigars, with some other slight changes.

The department has previously urged the passage of similar bills heretofore introduced in Congress. As the matter now stands, the importation of cigars by parcel post or otherwise in the mails is absolutely prohibited, as the limit of weight of parcel-post packages is 11 pounds, and 3,000 cigars will in every case weigh more than 11 pounds. Because of this restriction importers of all cigars arriving in the mails are subject to a fine.

For the above reasons I desire again to urge the passage of the bill, as, in the opinion of this department, if this bill becomes a law the revenue will be as fully protected as is now the case, and importers will not be subject to the annoyance now experienced or the odium which the imposing of a fine casts upon those not familiar with the restriction which the law fixes upon imported cigars, etc.

Respectfully,

WM. P. MALBURN,
Acting Secretary.

It will be seen, Mr. President, that the purpose of this amendment is not to increase revenue, but to remove an obstacle, and what appears to be the only obstacle to the negotiation of a parcel-post convention between the United States and the Republic of Cuba. I know of nothing that will facilitate reciprocal foreign trade to any greater degree than the extension of the mutual conveniences of the parcel-post conveyance between two given nations. To my mind that purpose outweighs, even if they exist, such apprehended consequences of competition as always accompany the enactment of a law that even seemingly enlarges trade.

My information is that the effect of this measure would not be to enlarge the foreign trade in cigars so much as to change the method of their importation to this country. A great many articles are imported to America from countries with which we have parcel-post conventions, and they are received under the provisions of section 644 of the postal regulations at what are known as post-office receiving exchanges. There the duties are collected without any difficulty whatever and the packages are then transmitted to the respective places of destination.

This change would therefore in no sense increase the difficulties or burden the method of collecting the revenue. The only possible effect of it, it seems to me, would be to enable packages in smaller quantities than are now sent to this country to pass through the mails and be received at the exchange post offices. It would therefore tend to reduce what might be called the wholesale business from Cuba by substituting for it a retail business and at the same time open the facilities for trade with the Republic of Cuba to all other branches of industry and of commerce.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask the Senator where under this provision the examination is to take place.

Mr. THOMAS. I am told that the examinations are made of all goods which come by parcel post from other countries at the post-office exchanges where there are representatives and officials of the Treasury Department, and whose duty it is to make the examinations.

Mr. BRYAN. The Senator realizes, does he not, that the examination requires experts?

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly do. I do not realize it to the extent the Senator does, because my State is not in a tobacco-producing section.

Mr. BRYAN. My State is very largely interested, and I would dislike very much to see this provision go in the bill, in view of the Senator's acknowledgment that it has nothing whatever to do with the raising of revenue, but is simply placing in the revenue bill a provision to aid in postal conventions. That is all there is to it. It has nothing whatever to do with revenue legislation and has no business in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. There are a good many things in this bill that do not affect the revenue. Revenue bills in Congress, especially in modern times, are of an omnibus character and embrace many things which at first sight, perhaps, are opposed to each other. I am given to understand—my information may be incorrect, it comes from the Post Office Department—that at all the so-called receiving exchange post offices there are men thoroughly competent as experts to pass upon the quality as well of cigars and tobacco as all other things which are received from other countries with which we have conventions, and I therefore see no difficulty whatever which would arise from the suggestion made by the Senator from Florida.

But, as I said before the Senator came in, I have personally no interest in the subject whatever. I have been designated to present it for the consideration of the Senate and to give the reasons which prompted these two departments in asking for the adoption of the amendment. To my mind their reasons seemed to be conclusive. I believe that this Nation ought to be big enough and broad enough in the attempt to establish facilities for the carrying on of foreign trade to look to the main proposition, which can only be reached as other main propositions by doing a little damage here and there. My impression is, and it is my experience, that in all these cases the apprehended dangers and the actual evils which arise from legislation of this sort are in the proportion of about 99 to 1.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think this is a very unwise provision and entirely out of place upon a revenue bill. I have received protests against this provision from every State in the Union. I am not going to take the time to go into the details of a discussion of this subject, but I do want to call attention to a few of the objections raised by the extensive correspondence I have had in relation to the provision.

First, I wish to call attention to a letter from the Tobacco Merchants' Association of the United States, representing the tobacco merchants of this country, and in reading a portion of this letter I do so simply as a sample of other protests from other parties against this proposed amendment:

> By the proposed amendment the existing statute is changed by eliminating the minimum quantity of cigars that may be imported, which is 3,000, so that under the proposed act cigars may be imported in any quantity; and it also contains a new provision tending to facilitate the importation of cigars by mail or parcel post, thus opening up the parcel-post and post-office channels of distribution for cigars manufactured in Cuba.
> The customs duties required to be paid on imported Cuban cigars will not afford sufficient protection if the Cuban cigar manufacturer should be able to send a single box of cigars direct to the consumer by mail or parcel post. Such facilities will, no doubt, soon lead to the production of a cheap grade of cigars in Cuba and advertising them in the United States as the real Cuban article delivered direct to the consumer by mail or parcel post, duty paid, at inviting prices, with the result that the consumer would not only be deceived and misled by paying fancy prices for a cheap grade of cigars upon the strength of being "Cuban cigars," but you can readily see the injurious effect that such practice will have upon the American cigar industry, as well as upon the American farmers raising high-grade tobacco to compete with Cuban cigars.
> The proposed provision is, indeed, indefensible. There can be no excuse for our Government placing its postal and parcel-post machinery at the disposal of manufacturers in foreign countries to come here and compete with our own industries.

Under this provision, Mr. President, a Cuban dealer in cigars may send to this country a single box of cigars to any purchaser in the United States. It comes to the purchaser through parcel post through the collector of customs at the city or the district to which the cigars are shipped.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; Mr. President, the revenues are collected at the receiving-exchange post offices, of which there are only very few in the United States, and then the packages are forwarded to their place of destination.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, it would be very much easier for the Cuban manufacturer, if that is the case, than if it had to go to the district and be examined and appraised by the collector of customs.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be easier, but the fact is that all parcels containing dutiable goods coming to this country by parcel post from other nations are sent to what are called receiving exchange post offices.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the information which the Post Office authorities give me, and they refer to section 644 of the regulations. There the duty is collected, and then the goods continue on their journey to the destination. I think it ought to be so, because it is much simpler and much cheaper.

Mr. SMOOT. I know goods shipped from England and France by parcel post to parties in Salt Lake City, I will say, and the party to whom the goods are shipped pays the duty, and the valuation of the goods is placed upon them by the collector of the port in charge. I know that that happens very often. But if by this provision Cuban cigars will be shipped to a receiving-exchange post office and a valuation of the cigars made there and duty collected, the purchaser would have to send the amount of duty upon the cigars to the receiving-exchange post office before the package could be forwarded to him under the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Not under the provisions of the amendment, but under the collection of revenue as is provided by section 644.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the result is concerned, it would make no difference whether the duty is collected by the surveyor of the port to which the cigars are to be sent or whether it is collected at the receiving-exchange post office at which the cigars are received.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that the American merchants, those who pay the taxes and bear the burden of the Government, who help maintain all the institutions of our country, ought not to be put in competition with foreign manufacturers of cigars who do not have these obligations to meet. I believe it is an injustice and it should not be done.

I hope, Mr. President, the amendment will be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 62, page 110.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business in order that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] may submit a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will make the suggestion of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Page	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Husting	Phelan	Smoot
Brady	Jones	Pittman	Sterling
Brandegee	Kenyon	Pomerene	Stone
Bryan	La Follette	Ransdell	Swanson
Chilton	Lane	Reed	Taggart
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Thompson
Colt	Lewis	Shafroth	Underwood
Cummins	McCumber	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Curtis	McLean	Shields	Walsh
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Warren
Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Weeks
Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I report favorably from the Committee on Interstate Commerce the bill (S. 6981) to establish the eight-hour standard workday in interstate transportation, and for other purposes. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has been reported by him from the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I suggest now that the Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 6981) to establish the eight-hour standard workday in interstate transportation, and for other purposes, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours, in contracts for labor, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States. The provisions of this act shall not apply to electric street railways or electric interurban railways.

SEC. 2. That the President shall appoint a commission of three, to be known as the eight-hour day commission, which shall observe the administrative and financial effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday as above defined during a period of not less than six nor more than eight months, in the discretion of the commission, and within 30 days thereafter shall report its findings to the President and to Congress.

SEC. 3. That, pending the report of the eight-hour day commission, as above provided, and for a period of 90 days thereafter, the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all services in excess of eight hours such employees shall receive not less than the pro rata proportion of the compensation received for the standard eight-hour workday.

Any carrier violating this provision shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $100 and not exceeding $1,000 in respect to each employee whose compensation is affected by such violation, which penalty shall accrue to the United States, and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

Any person who shall willfully delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 4. That the eight hour day commission shall organize and select its own chairman and make all necessary rules for conducting its work. It shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such employees, to rent such offices, and to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which the commission was created. It shall, whenever practicable, be supplied with suitable quarters in any Federal building located at its place of meeting or at any place where the commission may adjourn for its deliberations.

The commission is authorized, as a whole or by subcommittee duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States; and all testimony before the commission shall be on oath or affirmation. Witnesses shall be paid the same witness fees and mileage as witnesses in courts of the United States.

For the purposes of this act the eight hour day commission, or any member thereof, shall have power to administer oaths, sign subpœnas, require the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents as may be material to a just determination of the matters under investigation by it; and may invoke the aid of the United States courts to compel witnesses to attend and testify and to produce such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents to the same extent and under the same conditions and penalties as are provided for in the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto.

A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and if the commission shall be divided in opinion, the findings of the majority upon any point shall be deemed the findings of the commission.

SEC. 5. That the members of the eight hour day commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses, and in addition a compensation of $25 per diem, payable monthly, while actually engaged in the work of the commission and while going to and returning from such work. The sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available on the requisition of the President, and to continue available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, or until the said commission shall have sooner completed its work, for the payment of the necessary and proper expenses incurred as hereinbefore authorized, including per diem of the commissioners, witness fees and mileage, rent, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books, salaries of employees, and traveling and other necessary expenses of members or employees of the eight hour day commission, to be approved by the chairman of said commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

SEC. 6. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and prescribe just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, prescribed by it on its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senate is aware of the emergency which has called for this legislation. It is therefore unnecessary for me to enlarge upon it. The President of the United States, in a recent message, requested the action of Congress upon these subjects: "First, immediate provision for the enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission along the lines embodied in the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives," and which has been favorably reported in the Senate. I have to say that the Committee on Interstate Commerce became informed that there would be a contention regarding the provisions of the bill—a very earnest and serious contention—as to what the form of reorganization should be and as to what the form of the division into branches or subdivisions might be; that the bill would take a great length of time for discussion; and that therefore it would be impracticable to bring that measure up at this time or to make it the means, as I originally proposed, of putting upon it the amendments which are necessary to meet this exigency. So the committee has concluded at this moment not to press the consideration of the bill for the enlargement and subdivision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The second recommendation of the President was "the establishment of an eight-hour day as the legal basis alike of work and of wages." That recommendation we have endeavored to meet in the measure which has been now reported.

The third recommendation of the President was "the authorization of the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe the actual" operation of our legislation regarding the eight-hour day, and to report to the President and to Congress. We have endeavored to comply in the bill reported with this recommendation.

The fourth recommendation of the President was "explicit approval by the Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads" that may be required by reason of the introduction of the eight-hour system. With reference to that the committee has not acted, the committee being of the opinion that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to regulate rates and to fix reasonable rates, and that included in that power is the power unquestionably to consider the wages paid by the corporations in connection with other operating expenses, such considerations ranking side by side with other considerations as to capital invested, as to the value of the roads, and other features; and that therefore it was unnecessary to embody this recommendation in the proposed law; that it would be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to take up the new facts in connection with all other considerations that relate to the establishment of reasonable rates.

Fifth, the President recommended an amendment of the existing Federal statute for mediation and arbitration. A measure was prepared and was partially considered by the committee on this subject. That measure provided that where mediation and conciliation failed and where arbitration under the mediation act failed, there should be a governmental inquiry by a governmental commission appointed for the purpose of investigating the conditions of any controversy regarding wages; that that commission should report the facts, and that during the consideration of the subject by the commission the parties should be prevented by law from resorting, by combination and concert of action, either to the lockout or the strike. This was a very important measure, requiring much discussion, and it is apparent that we can not report that measure to-day. Whether or not it will be reported in the future remains for the determination of the committee. Individually I favor strongly this legislation.

Another and sixth recommendation was—

The lodgment in the hands of the Executive of the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of such portions and such rolling stock of the railways of the country as may be required for military use and to operate them for military purposes, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States such train crews and administrative officials as the circumstances require for their safe and efficient use.

A measure was drawn up upon the lines of this recommendation and was partially considered by the committee, but was laid aside for further consideration. Whether or not whilst this legislation is pending an amendment can be offered upon that subject remains for the committee to determine. It was also suggested in the committee, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] reminds me, that that was probably, partially at least, covered in the recent military bill.

Now, Mr. President, in addition to these recommendations, the committee has acted upon other subjects. It has provided in section 3 that—

Any person who shall willfully delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

I believe, Mr. President, that that is a most valuable provision. It is certainly violative of every principle of justice and of law that anyone should be permitted, either by organization or otherwise, to delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains engaged in interstate commerce. With reference to the strikes of the railway organizations, I am aware that their contention is that all they resort to is the power, which they unquestionably have, of giving up their employment. But we all know that there are scenes of great disorder connected with every strike, that on such occasions the disorderly elements of the community, particularly in the large cities, are let loose, and abundant opportunity is offered for violation of the law, not necessarily by members of the brotherhoods, but by criminal and disorderly people, who seize the opportunity for destruction and violation of the public peace in conditions of commotion.

The other subject, which was not treated in the President's message, is this——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to ask a question with regard to the matter just considered by the Senator, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to close my statement, I will be through in a few moments, and then will be glad to answer any question he may wish to propound.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I shall not insist.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The other provision to which I refer, not included in the President's message, is the provision—

SEC. 6. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and prescribe just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, prescribed by it on its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

With reference to that provision, I have to say that that power can not be exercised by the commission until after the period prescribed by this bill for the operation of the eight-hour law, and therefore does not interfere at all with that period of some months during which this experiment of action and of observation will be made. After that time it will be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the hours of labor and the rate of wages, either in whole or in part on its own initiative or on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

With reference to that, I have to say that to-day the wages are practically fixed by the executive officers of the companies. Of course, outside of that, there is the right of contract between the parties. Your committee was of the opinion that these corporations are quasi public corporations; that they are in the public service; and that it is the right of Congress, and its duty, to see to it that all the humanities are exercised with reference to the regulation of hours of labor and the wages of labor by these great public servants, and that this matter should not be longer the subject, on the one hand, of the greed of railway managers eager for profits, nor, on the other hand, the subject of the mere ipse dixit of organizations of employees, who, in a moment of time, can, by concert of action under present conditions, tie up the entire commerce of the country and inflict upon the innocent untold misery and suffering and distress. Your committee felt that something is required upon this subject; that the future should be guarded, and that now is the time to guard the future instead of waiting for a later time, when a period of apathy and inertia might come; that now, when men are thinking, thinking earnestly, thinking deeply, and their minds are working upon a great social question involving social justice, is the time for action upon so important a question, involving the humanities of our social system.

Now, Mr. President, I shall be very glad to answer any question put to me by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question I rose to propound is this: Does the section which the Senator from Nevada read, and which relates to penalties for willfully obstructing or hindering the movement of trains, apply simply to physical hindrance or obstruction, or will it be construed to impose the penalty there provided upon an employee who refuses to move the train or the engine which theretofore he had been accustomed to run?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The latter aspect to which the Senator refers did not, according to my recollection, come up for consideration or discussion in the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no opinion about it, and I am asking purely for information. I did not know but that the Senator from Nevada had considered that phase of the subject.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I know what was in my own mind in reference to this matter, and that was to keep open the arteries of commerce and not to permit anyone willfully to obstruct them.

Mr. CUMMINS. The motive is very good, of course; but the Senator from Nevada will recognize that there are certain rules of law which might prevent imposing those penalties upon an operative who simply refused to work in his employment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will say that when I voted for the provision I did not have in contemplation to in any way affect the sacred right of every man to give up any employment in which he may be engaged. I regard any condition that would interfere with that as involuntary servitude, forbidden by the law of humanity and by the organic law of our country. I did not intend, therefore, that it should have any such application.

Mr. CUMMINS. One further question. Does the Senator intend by this bill or does he believe that this bill will, if passed, repeal the 16-hour law now in force in the United States?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Only in so far as it conflicts with it.

Mr. CUMMINS. We now have a statute which prohibits continuous employment or service on trains for more than 16 hours, and I wondered, as I looked over it, whether it was intended by this amendment to repeal that statute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand, and as has been suggested to me by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the 16-hour law fixes the hours of labor, whilst this bill practically fixes the rate of wage.

Mr. CUMMINS. I realize that, and I do not express any opinion upon that subject, but this bill fixes the rate of compensation for overtime over eight hours a day; it fixes eight hours as the basis of a day's work; and it seems to me that it is well worthy of thought whether, if we pass this bill, we have not repealed the absolute limitation upon continuous service. These suggestions I have made not from any controversial or hostile spirit, but to get a clear understanding of what the majority of the committee believe the bill will accomplish.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I desire to read lines 10 to 14 of section 3 and then to ask a question with reference to it:

> Any person who shall wilfully delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

The question I desire to ask is whether that is not a contribution by the committee outside of anything suggested by the President?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is. I stated that.

Mr. REED. Now I desire to ask another question. I am referring to section 6, and I want to read it:

> That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and prescribe just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

That likewise is a contribution by the committee, and was not suggested by the President?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it was not a subject of recommendation, and I so declared in my opening statement.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if he is willing to provide that these 450,000 railway men shall be deprived of the right to make contracts with reference to their own pay, and to provide then that if they shall in any way obstruct a train—which might be construed, I think, to include the mere quitting of the engine, or the quitting of the position of conductor—they shall be fined and sent to jail? I wish the Senator would tell us why that does not establish involuntary servitude in this country; and I wish he would tell us why, when it is necessary to have this bill passed in order to prevent a strike at the present time, such a question as that is injected into it—a question that is bound to arouse antagonism that is country-wide, and bound to arouse antagonism in this body?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me just one minute?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; but if the Senator from Nevada will permit me for a moment, I wish to correct a misapprehension, I think, of his former statement, which replies in a measure to that of the Senator from Missouri. The committee did consider, discuss, and confer about the provision found in section 3 from lines 10 to 14; and I distinctly recall that the opinion of the committee was that that was not intended to interfere with any strike; it was not supposed that it could properly be construed to mean anything except physically delaying, obstructing, or hindering the passage of a train which otherwise would pass to its destination on time.

I think the committee would have modified that amendment if it could have been construed in any other way. I also think there has been a misprint in the bill as it is now presented, because I am sure that the penalty was $500 and not $5,000, making it much less. I am sure also that it was not intended to apply to the condition stated by the Senator from Missouri, and I do not think it would be so construed.

Mr. REED. The penalty is not merely $500 or $5,000; it is a fine of either $500 or $5,000, depending upon which way the facts are, and, in addition to that, the language is "and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a moment, I asked the question in the committee which I have now asked on the floor. It was not very satisfactorily answered, for there seemed to be some difference of opinion among the members of the committee, if I may be permitted to speak of our meeting; and I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri. The Senator just said that section 6 covered, I think, 450,000 employees. Section 6 covers 1,800,000 employees of railway companies.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, Mr. President, I wish to answer, if I may without interruption, the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri.

I will say that if there is anything in this bill that interferes with the liberty of action of any employee of a railroad company in giving up his employment, I should be glad to see it amended so as to relieve it of that feature. I certainly had no such thing in mind when I supported this amendment, which is not my amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me, I prefer to answer completely the question of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. In addition to that, the suggestion is made that it is rather unbecoming in the committee to go any further than the President's recommendation. I wish to say that I feel that it is my duty as a legislator, with reference to every matter coming up for legislation before a committee of which I am a member, to urge my views as to what constitutes a remedy for an existing condition; and I feit, so far as I was individually concerned, that I would be in a humiliating position if I should at a serious juncture like the present fail to make some suggestion that would guard the future, and I supported these amendments when they were offered upon the assumption that they were wisely framed for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to reply to the Senator from Missouri, I will yield to him in one moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield at present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I believe in a government of law and of order, and not in a government of force, where an individual or an organization can apply force to society and demand submission. We have had some realization of what the doctrine of force means in international complications. For years, by conventions between the nations, we have been endeavoring to use something besides force for the settlement of international differences. We have been endeavoring to create international tribunals in which reason, not force, should be employed for the settlement of international differences. The humanities of our time have entirely failed, though the energies of the best minds have been for many years addressed to this great question, and to-day the world is involved in a cataclysm far surpassing anything in its previous history. The basis of it all is that one or more powers failed to submit to reason, and resorted to force.

There never has been a time during this entire period when all the differences between these countries could not have been settled and adjusted more logically by reason than by force. They can be settled to-day by reason much better than they can be settled by the outcome of this war; for after this war is ended, and one of the contending forces is victorious, we will find differences arising between the conquering nations as to their interests which will involve the application of force and not reason to settle them, just as the great Balkan war settled nothing, and left the victors to fight among themselves and surrender the spoils of their victory, each one coming out of that great struggle worse in fortune than when it entered it.

Mr. President, it has been our proud boast that in domestic controversies law and reason controlled and not force, and we have created tribunals for the settlement and adjustment of differences between man and man; but we have never yet created a tribunal which can settle and determine these great differences between employer and employee. We say they must have absolute liberty of action, liberty of employment, liberty to quit, and yet we have found that that "liberty" meant a resort to the doctrine of force, sometimes upon the part of employers and at others upon the part of employees—one of them asserted in the lockout, the other asserted in the strike. Is society, is a great Republic and democracy like this, to confess its impotence to meet this great question to which we have been addressing ourselves with so much zeal and fervor in our international affairs?

How many recommendations have we made during this very contest for the substitution of reason for force in the determination of international contests? Shall we apply our talents and our energies only to the study of that question and confess ourselves impotent before a civil war which is approaching, and which, if carried out to its logical outcome, will embrace as many horrors as the existing European war?

Mr. President, as the chairman of this committee, charged with the duty of reporting a bill upon this important subject, I would have felt myself a coward had I failed to suggest some remedy by which law and order may be maintained, so that reason, justice, and humanity may at last prevail.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if there ever was a time in recent years when we ought to proceed wisely, without any excitement or with blood in our heads, and endeavor to meet a practical question in a practical way this is that time.

If I understand the situation, the representatives of the railway employees have said, in substance, that if the eight-hour day is legally recognized and a law is passed similar to that which is set forth in the bill down to the penalty clause in section 3, the strike will be declared off. If the strike is declared off, time will then intervene in which to settle, after ample discussion and deliberation, all the other difficult questions. The strike is now called for the 4th day of September, and unless the strike order is recalled the business of the United States will come to a standstill.

Mr. President, with that situation before us, why should we drag into the question matters of the most serious concern that are not necessary to meet the present emergency—questions that will inevitably provoke contrariety of opinion, bitterness of debate, prolonged discussion, and will defeat the passage of this bill in time to prevent the catastrophe which now is impending?

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] states that he would be ashamed as a legislator not to do his full duty. What is his full duty is a question for him to consider; but I can not understand why, in a great crisis when immediate action is necessary, a man should regard it as his duty to transform that crisis into a calamity by introducing other questions which will make the avoidance of the crisis absolutely impossible.

Section 6 of this bill and parts of section 3, taken together, are absolutely revolutionary in the laws of this country. The whole bill is a radical departure from anything we have hitherto had, and we are asked to act upon that part of it which the President especially called to our attention quickly. I believe it is the consensus of opinion that we should do so; and yet under ordinary circumstances we would not act upon those questions which the President did suggest without full and complete debate and thorough consideration. Now, at this crisis, in this time of haste, when the house is burning down before our eyes, the Senator from Nevada wants us to stop and reform all creation and change everything, in the face of that crisis.

Senators, it is the height of unwisdom to attempt any such program. More than that, when you lay before the railway employees of this country—as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has said, the 1,800,000 of them—a proposition which they will construe as taking away from them for all their lives the right of individual contract, you will arouse such feeling, such consternation, such indignation, that instead of stopping this strike you will make it inevitable.

Why should we not proceed along the line the President suggested, namely: First, pass an eight-hour day law; second, accept the statement made by the heads of these railway organizations that if that law is passed the strike will be called off; third, when the strike is called off, when the pending trouble has passed, when we meet here next December, when the investigation has been had which this bill properly provides for, and we know what we are acting upon, when we are made acquainted with the facts that have been developed in the actual trial of the eight-hour experiment—when all these things are before us, when the views of all the parties affected can be heard and digested and debated, at that time and under those circumstances undertake such remedial legislation as may be wise under the circumstances?

I hope that we can promptly get rid of these two troublesome sections and get this bill on its passage. Without desiring to say anything that may seem harsh or offensive, I am astounded at such a crisis and upon such an issue to find these outside questions, these serious questions, unnecessarily thrust into the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I concur with what the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said in reference to this bill being presented here to meet a most important question, a vital question to all the American people. If it were not for the serious contingencies that the American people are facing to-day that might be brought about by general strike conditions in this country, I take it that every Senator on the floor of this Chamber will admit that this bill would not be before this body at this time—necessarily so.

The Senator says that this is a new departure in legislation, and that it proposes radical legislation. Both conditions are true, whether you leave section 6 in the bill or strike it out.

We are proceeding by law to fix the rates of wages for 400,000 men in the United States without knowledge on our part of the facts. I do not doubt the power of the Congress of the United States, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, to regulate the instruments of interstate commerce, and in regulating the instruments of interstate commerce to fix rates of wages as well as to fix hours of labor, which we have already done by legislation in the past, when we passed the 16-hour law that is now on the statute books, or to fix the rate at which transportation shall be carried on throughout the country. In my judgment, we undoubtedly have the power.

A decade or more ago it was regarded as radical legislation in this country when Congress established a commission that would fix just and reasonable rates for the transportation of freight. We were told then that it was most drastic legislation and interfering with the rights of private property. But the American Congress recognized that its supreme duty was not to individuals but to the great mass of the American people, not to the exceptional case, but to prescribe rules and regulations by which the American people may live and thrive and make their living.

The arteries of commerce that are affected by this bill are just as important to the life of the Nation as the veins and arteries in the human system that convey the blood to and from the heart to the extremities of the body. Paralyze those arteries of trade, these lines of transportation, and you decree death to this Nation. You decree that the industries of this country shall be stopped, that men by the million shall be driven from their employment, that women and children shall suffer and starve.

Is not that a more important question than the question that your predecessors faced two generations ago when in the public interest they said the Congress should establish a commission to prescribe just and reasonable rates of freight in this country?

I am in favor to-day of labor having every opportunity to upbuild itself, to secure fair hours of service and fair rates of pay. In a record of over 20 years' service in the Congress of the United States I have uniformly voted for legislation that will upbuild and uplift the labor of this country, because from the labor of the country, whether organized or unorganized, springs in the last analysis the lifeblood of the Nation. The future of our country is dependent upon the upbuilding of the toilers of America.

But when you tell me that my duty to the American people, my duty to my country, my protection of my flag is served by simply consenting without knowledge to a temporary settlement of a problem that will last but six months by the terms of the settlement and lead to nothing, that I have served the great American people by surrendering my legislative power to the dictation of some one else, then I say that if I must legislate and fail to stand for what I conceive to be the interests of my individual constituency and the true interests of the great American public, they can not take my commission away from me too quick for my own satisfaction and the benefit of the constituency I represent.

Senators, the American people have a right to your consideration in disposing of the legislation before this body. Now, what are we confronted with? This demand for an increase of wage of 25 per cent may be right and it may be wrong. Not a man here has investigated the question, not a man here knows the details. There has been no opportunity to learn or consider them. We merely know that the representatives on the part of labor say it is right and that the representatives on the part of the railroads say if they yield it will be destructive to their property. Now, that is the extent of the information we have. And yet we are going to-day to vote by legislative enactment an increase of wage of 25 per cent of the present wage without knowledge on our part of what we are legislating.

I am for the bill, and I propose to vote to make that increase. How can I justify myself in that vote to the constituency I represent? But in one way. The people of the United States are threatened with a debacle that is not equaled by anything that has ever occurred in the history of this country except a great war. Starvation, business paralysis, distress, stare the people of the United States in the face if this condition was allowed to take place. For one I am willing to surrender my individual judgment, admit that I am legislating without knowledge, to bring peace—commercial peace, industrial peace—to the homes of the people of this Nation. If that did accomplish the result that is the better line; but if that did not accomplish the result, rather than bring destruction to the country, I would not for one minute hesitate to use the mailed hand in so far as I am concerned. This is the right, the better way, and I am glad to have the opportunity to embrace it, but our country must stand first.

Now, the President of the United States, occupying his great office with this responsibility, realizing the danger and distress that might come to the American people if this unfortunate condition of a universal strike should arise, properly and courageously stepped into the breach and tried to stop the debacle. He was unsuccessful. It is idle, a waste of time, for us to consider now whose fault it was that the President was not successful. History may determine that question; it is not a matter of importance to the Senate of the United States when the burden has come to us, and we are clearing the way.

But the President of the United States made certain proposals through his Attorney General's office to the Congress to relieve the situation. He proposed that a bill, called an eight-hour bill, but, in fact, a bill fixing the wages on an eight-hour basis, should be passed. Why? Because the representatives of the great labor organizations of this country had stated to him that if that bill was passed they would call off the strike. That was the terms that they would not strike on, if you pass this bill recognizing eight hours as the basis of wage to be paid for a 10-hour day; nothing more and nothing less.

Now, we are going to pass that bill. We have accepted its conditions. The President of the United States accepts them, but the other side would not accept them. We have reached the point where we, representing the American people in the great legislatives bodies of this country, are going to accept the contract. We are going to make it a law of the land that for six months this eight-hour day as a basis of wage shall be tried out in this country.

When the six months are over what then? When the six months are ended what then? If there is nothing more than the eight-hour day, you are where you are to-day. The men have gotten their pay on an eight-hour basis of pay for six months. There is no guaranty in the bill that the railroad management shall continue to pay it at the end of the six months. There is no guaranty in the bill that the men themselves will not strike at the end of six months. You have stopped a strike for six months by paying this additional wage, but at the end of the six months you are where you are to-day.

Is that any settlement of this question for the American people, for the constituency that you and I represent, the constituency that has got a right to demand of us when we pass this legislation, admittedly without consideration, that we will protect their rights and their interest in the future?

The President of the United States realized that in the proposals to Congress. He did not come to the Congress and say, "Pass an eight-hour day and stop," because the President of the United States knew full well that if he stopped there he would have rendered nothing to the people of this country.

Senators, the men who are engaged in this controversy are of the brawn and sinew of the American people. There is no class of labor that stands higher than the men who are involved in this controversy for honesty, integrity, and true citizenship. But they are fighting for themselves, not for the American people, to-day.

I am not criticizing them for demanding what they conceive to be their rights, but we stand as an arbiter between them and the rights of the great American people, who are entitled to these highways to ship their commerce over. In fact, we are compelled to keep these highways open that the Nation may live.

I say the President of the United States recognized that he had not fully performed his duty to the American people by passing an eight-hour day. If so, why did he suggest any other legislation? The President of the United States, through his Attorney General, sent to the Congress besides this eight-hour bill a compulsory arbitration bill, a bill establishing a court of arbitration and carrying a clause in it compelling arbitration until the final decision of the arbitrators. More than that, he sent here a bill authorizing the President of the United States to use the mailed fist to take charge of these railroads under the military power of the United States and run them by the soldiers of the United States Government. He was right. He was right if it is necessary. I am glad we can avoid that necessity. I do not want to go to that necessity, but rather than block the commerce of this Nation, throttle the vitals of the life of the Nation, I would use the military power of this Government to take charge of the railroads and let the people of the United States live.

Now, that is what has been proposed to us through your committee, not an eight-hour day to settle this controversy. It is true if you only want to settle it for one side, if you only want to settle it in the interest of the organized labor of the railroads and leave your problem unsettled for the great American people, then pass the eight-hour-a-day bill. There will be no strike if you pass the eight-hour-a-day bill. No matter what else you put into the legislation, there can not be, because when the Congress of the United States has made this bargain it has got to wait six months first, and why should we say to the American people, "We will accept an eight-hour day, and at the end of six months you have got to face this condition and this contingency again"? Why should we say to the great shipping interests of the country, "We abandon all care and all thought of your rights and your interests in this matter"? If we would bend the suppliant knee because we fear our own future, then we may sail away from Charybdis, but the rocks of Scylla are on the other side.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Alabama being a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee has, of course, aided in the preparation of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did.

Mr. STONE. I never saw the bill, and knew nothing about it until it was brought in here an hour and a half or two hours ago.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly hastily; and there would be no justification for the hasty preparation and consideration of this bill if it were not for existing circumstances.

Mr. STONE. That is undoubtedly true; but what I rose for was to get some information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be glad to furnish it if I can.

Mr. STONE. I am sure the Senator can, for my inquiry is along the line of his remarks, to which I have been listening.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am interested in this matter and would like to hear what the Senator says.

Mr. STONE. I will try to address myself to the Senator so as to be heard, for I think I am not alone in desiring this information. The Senator said, as I understood him, that the bill, if enacted, would only compose the situation for about six months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I meant the bill if enacted with section 6 out. With section 6 in, I think it will compose it permanently.

Mr. STONE. Section 1 seems to provide, as I understand the reading, that after January 1 next eight hours shall be made the basic day or standard day for labor on the part of those who are engaged in the actual operation of trains on interstate roads.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is my understanding of the bill that 8 hours shall be the standard day; then 10 hours' wages as at present constituted shall be paid for an 8-hour day.

Mr. STONE. Will not that provision, if agreed to by Congress and enacted into law, be permanent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; under the terms of the bill as sent to us by the President it is only temporary, and at the end of six months from the time when the investigation expires the whole question goes back where it is to-day.

Mr. STONE. Would the eight-hour day proposition be remitted to the exact situation we have to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the managers of the railroads desired to do so. There is no limitation of law to prevent it.

Mr. STONE. I did not so read the bill in the hasty reading we have had an opportunity to make. I will say to the Senator that reading section 2 and the following section providing for the appointment of a commission and defining its duties it is provided that the present wages shall continue until the commission reports.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. That must be within between six and eight months.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. That part of it I understand to be temporary—that is to say, until they make their report—but I am rather surprised at what the Senator says, and I am anxious to know exactly what the truth is as to the permanency of the eight-hour-day proposition itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator there was no dispute about it in the committee, and I do not think anybody disputes it whatever who has carefully read the bill, that the making of an eight-hour day for the measurement of wages under the bill is only to last until the report of the commission is made, which may be at the end of six months, and must be before the end of eight months.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator refer me to the provisions of the bill upon which he bases that opinion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not wish to stop in my discussion, but if the Senator will reread the bill, he will see that. I can not put my finger right on it now, but it is unquestionably in the bill.

Mr. REED. Let me suggest to the Senator that it is section 3 to which he refers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, I am not referring to section 6. With section 6 I think we have accomplished something.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is referring to it with section 6 out?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. With section 6 out it is only a temporary expedient.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not prepared to deny positively what the Senator from Alabama says as to the permanency of the eight-hour day if the bill passes, but I had assumed and I am still of the opinion that the bill makes the eight-hour standard day a permanent thing. I know of nothing in the bill which would terminate that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. I think we can settle that very quickly. At the end of six months, or after the commission reports, is there anything in the bill which will prevent the managers and directors of a railroad company from fixing the hours of labor and the rate of wage on their company as they see proper?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Except the law says the eight-hour day shall be the standard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the eight-hour day does not fix the standard of wage. You can reduce the wage. It is not the standard of labor, mark you. If it had been the standard of labor and said no man should work longer than eight hours, you might put that construction on it, but it is merely the standard of wages.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know, and what——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is nothing in the bill that at the end of six months would prevent the managers and directors of any railroad in the country from reducing the rate even below the present wages if they saw proper, except probably the finding of the commission, which might so influence them that they would continue the present status.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The bill certainly reads—and I think it would be well to read the line to show it—as follows:

That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours, in contracts for labor, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed, etc.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is there in the bill that ever terminates eight hours from being the standard for compensation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I said, the eight hours is not the standard for compensation. What is there in the bill to prevent any director from reducing the pay under the standard? Calling it an eight-hour day does not make an eight-hour day. It is merely fixing a standard of wage, and there is nothing in the bill to prevent a president or board of directors from lowering the wage at the end of the six months.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My remarks were called forth in relation to the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, who asked as to the permanency of this provision, and the Senator said it was only temporary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to stop in my remarks to read the bill, but I will do so. The real clauses of the bill that govern this question are sections 2 and 3. Section 2 provides—

That the President shall appoint a commission of three, to be known as the eight hour day commission, which shall observe the administrative and financial effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday as above defined during a period of not less than six nor more than eight months, in the discretion of the commission, and within 30 days thereafter shall report its findings to the President and to Congress.

SEC. 3. That, pending—

Mark the word "pending"—

That pending the report of the eight hour day commission, as above provided, and for a period of 90 days thereafter, the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all services in excess of eight hours such employees shall receive not less than the pro rata proportion of the compensation received for the standard eight-hour workday.

I do not see how it can be clearer than that when it says that this fixing of the wage shall be pending the report of this eight-hour day commission. When I said a moment ago, that this wage would only last six months under the terms of the commission's report, I should have said that it might extend 90 days beyond that; but that does not affect the argument which I make. My argument is, that this bill fixes a temporary time, when the increase of this wage shall expire, and that at the end of that time you will be just exactly where you are to-day, and nowhere else.

Mr. BRADY. And, as I understand the section as the Senator from Alabama reads it, there is no condition that could arise that would extend this time beyond one year—that is, the nine months provided for in the first part of the bill, and then the 90 days after their expiration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; at the end of that time you would be where you are to-day. It could not go beyond that.

Mr. BRADY. It would end then, no matter what the finding of the commission might be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It might end in six months or it might end in a year.

Mr. BRADY. But it could not possibly extend longer than one year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It could not possibly under any circumstances extend longer than one year before you would be facing the condition which you are facing to-day.

Mr. LANE. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that there was no Member of this body who understood the problems which are involved in this bill; that he himself did not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say the basic problems. I did not mean the theoretical problems.

Mr. LANE. So far as the basic and the vital questions are concerned. If, according to the Senator's statement and his summing up, it merely defers the matter for six months, would not that six months be valuable time in which Members of the Senate could study the subject and acquire accurate information; and would they not then be better prepared to consider the question than they are to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly, if we could do so; but we can not.

Mr. LANE. But I understood the Senator to say that the bill would afford that opportunity. I know in the profession of which I am a member, that many members of that profession go for six months to acquire special training in order to fit themselves to do work along certain lines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will come to that point. I have not been able to reach it yet, because I have been interrupted; but I shall come to it, if the Senator will permit me to proceed.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. STERLING. With all due deference to the construction put upon this language by the Senator from Alabama, I certainly think he must be wrong in saying that the eight-hour day, as fixed in the bill, is done away with after the report of the commission, or that it only lasts until the report of the commission.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said——

Mr. STERLING. Now, if the Senator will excuse me——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I said that the fixing of the wage which is guaranteed under this bill is done away with at the expiration of the time of the commission making its report. It does not make any difference whether you call it an eight-hour day or not, because there is no eight-hour day involved. It is only an eight-hour basis for fixing pay; and you can go on saying that you have an eight-hour day, but the fact is there is no eight-hour day in this bill. We might as well face it fairly. I believe in an eight-hour day, but an eight-hour day means that a man shall work eight hours, and work no longer than eight hours. There is nothing of that kind contemplated by this bill.

Mr. STERLING. The day which is provided for in the first lines of the bill is an eight-hour day, and it may be the day for all time, so far as the terms of the bill are concerned. Section 3 simply relates to the wage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; and the only thing in the bill is the wage.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me answer the Senator from South Dakota, please. If the Senator would go and consult with any of the gentlemen who represent the employees, and who have been contending here in this matter, they would tell him candidly, as they told me, that the question is a question of wage; that they are not contending for an eight-hour day, that a man shall work only eight hours; they do not want that. They work by piecemeal on the engines and in the cars. It is piecework; it is not hour work. They are merely taking this eight hours as a basis for pay, and the pay will expire when this commission reports.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. A single illustration will show that the Senator from Alabama is right and that his position can not be well contradicted. Suppose after the lapse of 6 months or of 9 months or of 12 months, whenever the report of the commission comes in, and 90 days thereafter pass, an employee works 12 hours upon a run, under the present system he would be entitled to 2 hours' overtime. We will assume that his present wage is as high as $5 per day; that his 10 hours and his 2 hours' overtime give him $5 per day. Under the law that is proposed here his overtime will be four hours, instead of two hours, but the railroad company is at absolute liberty after that time to reduce his compensation to $5 a day——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CUMMINS. And to distribute it over the four hours' overtime, just as it now distributes it over the two hours' overtime.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unquestionably; and that is the gravamen of my statement, that at the end of 6 or 12 months, when this commission shall have made their report, you will be just where you are to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The practical effect of the bill, then, is to fix the wage for these employees for the term of possibly one year?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; that is the practical effect of the bill, unless you leave section 6 in it.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Unless you leave section 6 in the bill there will be nothing in this proposed legislation to settle this great question, in which the American people are interested, for longer than one year at the outside. The President of the United States did not ask you to do that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield before going on further.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator, before he starts to discuss this matter—I am in doubt as to what extent the men in the employ of the railroads are covered by this bill—how many of the employees are covered by this wage fixing?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am in some little doubt myself about the construction of that; but I will tell the Senator from Idaho what my construction is. I think this bill covers all those men who are engaged in the operation of train service—not merely the men who are in the unions, but other men; for instance, the telegraphers, who are not in the union here. They are engaged in the operation of the train service. I do not think the eight-hour provision of the bill, so called, applies to the trackmen or to the men at the railroad stations—the station agents—but I would say myself that such a law would be very unjust if it applied only to the man who sits in the engine or the man who rides in the car, and did not consider the man who works as a switch hand, as a trackman, or a man who is a station agent. I would feel it would be unjust.

The bill, however, is only temporary. The only justification for us passing this bill at this time and in this hasty way, without knowledge and without consideration, is the fact that we are doing it to meet a very grave emergency to the American people. We are not passing this bill in the interests of the trainmen, but we are passing it in the interests of the American people, if we pass it right and properly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, manifestly the bill can not cover those who are engaged in intrastate work. Would it cover the trackmen and switchmen?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think the bill would; but I will say that I have not given careful consideration to that portion of the bill, because that part of it is temporary. Section 6, if put into life, will cover, without any discrimination, every man who works for a railroad.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from Alabama made a statement of the final effect of section 6 of this bill. Does he understand that section 6 would take the place of the compulsory-arbitration law?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it would not, and that is the reason I am in favor of section 6, that it would accomplish the result, but I would ask the Senator to let me finish my statement in reference to section 6, to explain directly what it means and why I think it ought to be in the bill. Then I will answer the question.

Mr. CHILTON. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to say to Senators that this eight-hour-day law does not cover the case; it does not cover the request of the President of the United States. He wanted something in this legislation that would control in the interest of the American people, and, if you stop with this eight-hour-day bill, without section 6, you will have a piece of legislation that is merely the purchase price of peace. That is all you will have done. You will have done nothing for the American people, but you will have paid the price of peace. Having that contingency to face, was it not the duty of the committee to put something into the bill to protect the American shipper and the American public?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Government is purchasing its peace for $60,000,000 a year, does not the Senator from Alabama think it would be honester for the Government to pay it out of its own Treasury instead of reaching into the treasury of some other persons and having them pay it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a very grave ethical question, but I do not care to now stop to discuss it.

I am going to vote for this bill, because I think it is in the interest of my constituency, and I shall vote for it to stop this calamity; but when I do it, I want to do something toward the permanent settlement of these questions that will be in the interest of the great constituency that I represent and in the interest of the country.

We felt we could not proceed along the lines of the President's suggestions. The President asked for a compulsory arbitration act; but the members of the committee, at least many of them, felt that a compulsory arbitration act, such as had been set before us, was in violation of the Constitution of the United States; that it would probably be construed by the court to involve involuntary servitude and would be declared to be unconstitutional.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me finish my sentence. More than that, we realize that, if there wa one single piece of legislation that the very men who were involved in this controversy—the laboring men—did not want and would be dissatisfied with, it would be compulsory arbitration. Now, I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama on several occasions has stated that the President has favored or recommended compulsory arbitration. At what time did he recommend it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I am talking about the bills. The Senator from Missouri admitted that all these bills were bills that the President had recommended; the bills that came before our committee were laid before us in compliance with the message of the President of the United States delivered in the House of Representatives several days ago, in which he outlined several lines of bills. One of the Assistant Attorneys General and one of the members of the board of conciliation came before the committee and presented the bills, as representing the executive branch of the Government. I do not know whether the President of the United States indorsed those bills.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a moment, please, if the Senator from Alabama will yield to me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the junior Senator from Nevada?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to read the President's declarations and his recommendations, and then leave the matter to the judgment of Senators as to what they mean.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that he is attempting to raise an issue, or have me raise an issue, as to whether the President is in favor of compulsory arbitration. I am talking about the bills sent down here by the President, and, if the Senator will examine them, he will see the clause that produces the result I have indicated.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator will not object to my reading a short paragraph from the President's address, will he?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; but I am making no issue on that question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I read from the message delivered by the President several days ago at the joint session of the two Houses of Congress, as follows:

> Fifth, an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for the mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail, a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was really quite familiar with the message of the President. I heard it read by the President, and the language the President uses there confirms exactly what I said.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to make one word of explanation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is a misapprehension regarding that language. I contend that the words "compulsory arbitration" have been very loosely used both in the committee and in the hearings on yesterday as applicable to the President's recommendation. The President did not recommend compulsory arbitration. What he recommended was a governmental investigation of the facts, and during the investigation a stay of the right of lockout and strike until the investigation was concluded.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. So that it is public and governmental investigation, not compulsory arbitration, that the President has suggested.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is my view of it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the term has been very loosely used, and it is catching. I found that in the committee and in the hearings the expression "compulsory arbitration" was being continually used, although I have no doubt that all understood that the real recommendation of the President was simply for a Government investigation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Understanding it in that way, I objected to the continual use by the Senator from Alabama of the expression "compulsory arbitration," for there is nothing in the President's message from which any inference of that kind can be drawn.

Now, as to the bills that have been submitted by one of the clerks of the Department of Justice, I can not see why the Senator from Alabama should attribute those bills as expressing the ideas of the President on this subject, when, as I understand, they were submitted by the Department of Justice as examples of various characters of legislation that might reach this subject. Certainly, if any of those bills are in conflict with the declarations of the President, made public to both bodies of Congress, then his public declarations must be taken as against the declaration of some clerk in the Department of Justice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The President's declarations are taken. I am glad the Senator from Nevada, in my time, should fly to the defense of the President. I am even willing to defend the President of the United States myself, and I have done so on numerous occasions and am attempting to do so now. I said that I stood with the President when he suggested that if it was necessary to use the mailed hand he would use it to stop this debacle. So would I if it were necessary.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, again I beg to say the President did not say that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, he did not use those words, but he said he wanted us to pass a bill that would give him control under the military arm of the Government.

Mr. PITTMAN. For the sole and only purpose of taking food to the military forces of our Government and handling the military situation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course. The Senator is informing us of something that we have never heard before, although we were all present when the President delivered his message. Surely the President had a reason, and a good reason, for saying why he wished to take over the railroads, and I concur with what the President said.

Now, as to the question of compulsory arbitration. It probably is a loose expression. The President favored in his bill the preventing of men from stopping work by strikes pending a decision by the board of conciliation. His recommendation was that pending the report of the board of conciliation these men should not be allowed to strike. I possibly loosely called that "compulsory arbitration." The Senator is probably correct. It is probably not a proper application of the term. But compulsory arbitration, in my judgment, is unconstitutional. It would be unconstitutional, in my opinion, for us to enact a law providing that these men should be forced to work pending the decision of a board of conciliation. Therefore we did not put such a provision in the bill. That is all there is to it. I think the provision that we put in the bill answers the purpose without going as far as that, and that there can not be any question about it.

Before passing from that proposition my attention is called to the portion of the President's message in which he said:

> There is one other thing we should do if we are true champions of arbitration. We should make all arbitral awards judgments by record of a court of law in order that their interpretation and enforcement may lie, not with one of the parties to the arbitration, but with an impartial and authoritative tribunal.

Mr. PITTMAN. But does not that anticipate that there is an agreement to arbitrate first?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it does not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, where in the bill is there any provision for an arbitration?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator evidently has not read the bill that was sent to us. I am not defending the bill that was sent to us.

Mr. PITTMAN. I evidently read it more carefully than the Senator has read the President's message.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is what the President said—and he is right about it:

I was seeking to compose the present in order to safeguard the future, for I wished an atmosphere of peace and friendly cooperation in which to take counsel with the representatives of the Nation with regard to the best means for providing, so far as it might prove possible to provide, against the recurrence of such unhappy situations in the future—the best and most practicable means of securing calm and fair arbitration of all industrial disputes in the days to come. This is assuredly the best way of vindicating a principle, namely, having failed to make certain of its observance in the present, to make certain of its observance in the future.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is understood by the Senator from Alabama and the Committee on Interstate Commerce that the bill which the Senator is now discussing has the approval of the President, is it not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill that is before the Senate?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, as the Senator from Nevada stated to the Senator from Missouri awhile ago, there are two clauses in this bill that, so far as I know, the President had no part in. He may or he may not approve them; but, so far as I know, he had no part in them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The President, as I understand, is not antagonistic to this bill or this proposed piece of legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The President, so far as this eight-hour bill is concerned, is in favor of it, but he wanted it supplemented with other legislation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The purpose of that inquiry was to emphasize the fact that all of this talk about what the President said in his message is wholly irrelevant at this time, except as an issue between Senators. It throws no light on this bill, and for that reason I can not see the necessity for the further discussion of that phase of the question. I was under the impression, however, that the bill was brought here by the committee with the stamp of the President's approval upon it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. So far as I know, the President approves this bill from top to bottom, but I do not know as an absolute fact whether or not he has seen section 6.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, I will say that the President has not seen section 6, nor has he seen the latter part of section 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator from Nevada any reason to believe that the President approves either section 6 or section 3?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have not. I will state, in that connection, that the President made well-balanced recommendations. One recommendation involved a condition of truce, so that reason could operate. Then he recommended securing the future against similar conditions by wise legislation. One of the measures that he proposed was governmental investigation by a commission appointed by himself, with a stay of the privilege of strike or lockout during that period of investigation; that is, wherever a dispute arose in interstate commerce, the law would attach and compel an investigation of the facts before the privilege of lockout or strike could be resorted to. I favor that legislation myself, and I should like to see it passed to-day. I would like it even better than section 6, but the feeling of the committee was that we could not get it through at present and that it would have to come up for future consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. President, I should like to proceed with my remarks. I was endeavoring to set forth the bills that have been sent down here by the executive branch of the Government and supposed to carry out the wishes of the President, to give the reasons why we did not put them into operation fully, and why we adopted section 6 in their place.

Mr. President, there is no yielding in section 6 of any right that labor in this country possesses to-day; not one. There is no compulsory arbitration in section 6; there is no force in section 6. The only force in section 6 is the force of public opinion—that a disputed question should be settled by arbitration or by a disinterested judicial tribunal.

It has been asked, "Does the committee desire these men to be denied a fair right to make contracts?" No; the committee does not desire that, and it has not interfered with their right of contract, except when they are having negotiations in reference to strikes. The rates of wages on the railroads are fixed by the presidents and general managers and directors without consultation with the men. They are fixed arbitrarily and as firmly fixed as law, and when a man wants to make a contract in reference to them he is told how much wage he can get, and he contracts to accept it or reject it, as he sees fit. That is the only sayso he has, except when he has combined with others on an occasion like this in a general demand for a raise. Now, is it taking away a right from these railroad men to say that instead of the presidents and directors of these roads arbitrarily fixing their rate of wage we will turn it over to a disinterested tribunal to fix the rate of wage and the hours of labor?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator really mean that the men now have no right to bargain with their employers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say that.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say that the wages were now arbitrarily fixed by the employers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did, but I did not say the other.

Mr. REED. Is not this the real fact about the matter—that practically every schedule of wages that now exists upon the railroads was fixed as the result of negotiations between the representatives of the men and the representatives of the companies; that they have all been fixed by mutual agreement; that that has been the custom for a number of years?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That was the statement that I made. I stated that these men's wages were arbitrarily fixed except when, through their unions, they reached an agreement with the roads. I said that, but I will supplement what I said. I will say that that is true of 450,000 of the 1,800,000 men employed by the railroads. About one-third have had a chance to arbitrate and conciliate and make terms of agreement about their wages, and in the case of the other two-thirds their wage has been fixed all the time arbitrarily by the boards of directors and general managers of these railroad companies. Only about one-fourth of the men have had an opportunity to fix their wages, and the other three-fourths have had it arbitrarily fixed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another question, just to throw some light on this matter?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. REED. It now appears that at least as to the 450,000 trainmen who are the men immediately to be considered, and whose action, together with the action of their employers, has brought on this threatening condition, those 450,000 men have for a long time fixed their wages by mutual agreement between themselves and the railway companies. If section 6 is adopted, does not that terminate that right expressly in these words?—

The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, prescribed by it on its own initiative on the petition of the employees the managers of the railroads, or the public.

Does not that section, if it is passed and becomes law, for all time take away the right of the men by mutual agreement to fix their wages and place the wage-making power solely in the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It takes away nothing that the men now have. It does place the wage-making power in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under existing conditions the rate of wage is fixed by the owners of the railroads. They may make—and, as to certain employees, at times have made—concessions about the rate of wage, and under the organized brotherhoods I suppose that most of the wages now in existence have been arrived at by an arrangement of that kind. But who fixed the wage? It was because the owners of the property were willing to pay the wage, and for no other reason.

Mr. REED. And also that the men were willing to accept it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. REED. That is the other reason.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly. Now, there is nothing in this proposition to prevent the men from accepting or rejecting any wage that is offered to them. There is not in the other. The only difference is that this proposition broadens the wage scale so as to apply to 1,800,000 men instead of confining it to 450,000 men.

The President in his message says he desires to maintain the principle of arbitration in the settlement of disputes. The people of the United States have demanded that we should maintain the principle of arbitration in the settlement of wage disputes. This bill provides a permanent board of arbitration. It recognizes for the first time in the legislation of this Government an opportunity for labor to have its day in court and for the courts of this country to recognize the rights of labor; not that they must go on bended knee and beg for their rights; not that they must go with mailed fist and demand their rights; but that there is a tribunal in the land where they can go and present the case for their rights as every other man does in a civilized country about all other questions except labor.

Why, the very basis of civilization grew out of the fact that the law established courts in place of power; that in disputes about property the law opened the courts for the settlement of disputes instead of the use of force. Labor has been denied that right for centuries; and when the opportunity comes when men are willing to recognize that right, has not labor asked to have its disputes settled in courts of arbitration? Is not that a court? Have they asked to be driven to the terrors and the dangers of strikes? Must they be driven to those extremities before they get their rights?

Now, I do not know; it may be that some of the leaders of labor may think that if the court is open as a court of arbitrament for the rights of the toiler it may deprive them of some of their privileges and power. I do not believe it. I do not believe that there is any man who represents labor, no matter how high his position, who will not welcome an opportunity to give the men from whom he bears his commission a chance to settle their disputes and obtain their rights in a fair court of justice rather than on the battle field of dispute, the battle field of hunger, the battle field of deprivation, which men are put to when they are forced to go on strike. This section recognizes the rights of labor by law.

But that was not what I rose to discuss in this case. What I contend for is that if you pass this so-called eight-hour bill with nothing else in it, at the end of six months or a year you will be where you are to-day. You will have settled nothing for labor. You will have settled nothing for transportation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator has said that before. I understand the Senator's position to be that if this bill is confined to the eight-hour proposition we will get nowhere.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Without section 6.

Mr. SIMMONS. Without section 6.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator in the beginning of his speech to say that the reason why we could not treat this subject now in a broad and comprehensive way was that we did not have sufficient information. If we should pass the eight-hour proposition and create this commission with the powers of investigation that the bill proposes to confer upon it, with the provision that the hours and wage named in the bill should obtain until that commission has completed its investigation and three months afterwards, does not the Senator think that through that instrumentality and agency we would get the information that we now lack, and for the lack of which we are not now in a position to legislate with that fullness of information and knowledge essential to wise legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator candidly, that if the Congress of the United States intends to take on its own shoulders, by its own legislation, the question of fixing the hours of toil and the rate of wage, of course we would be enlightened by the finding of this commission, because it would give us information that we have not now. I take it, however, that the Congress of the United States has no idea whatever of itself directly legislating a wage scale except in the present emergency, when it is driven to it. In cases of this kind we always refer work of this class to commissions or other people. We did it when it was necessary to fix rates. Congress itself had the power to fix rates of transportation, but it did not exercise it. It referred the subject to a commission. I take it that whenever Congress gets ready to act permanently on this question, either now or in the future, it will not sit here and say as a legislative body what the rate of daily wage of those men shall be, but it will refer it to the judgment of some other body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If we are going to legislate the rate of wage, I concede that the Senator is correct; but if we are going to establish a tribunal to take this burden off of our hands for the future, there is no better time to settle that question than right now. We know the conditions that exist. We know the difficulties that we have to face. We know that if we do not face them now they will be back here on us in six months or a year, unless some propitious settlement is made. Therefore, I say, now is the time to settle the matter.

But I have been trying for some time to get down to the real line of argument that I started to make.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, is not this the situation:

We are confronted by an emergency which calls for—or, at least, which the President thinks calls for—some kind of legislative action. In this condition we find ourselves without the information necessary to enable us safely to adopt permanent legislation to meet that situation. In these circumstances, is it not wise to adopt such temporary legislation as will meet the specific emergency and at the same time provide for an inquiry that will afford us, or that we have reasonable ground to believe will afford us, reasonable information and enlightenment to enable us to legislate upon the subject, in all of its aspects, in a more satisfactory way than would be possible now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought I had answered that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer both at the same time. Let me answer the Senator's question. I thought I had answered the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I feared the Senator did not clearly understand my first statement; that perhaps I did not make myself quite clear.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I admit that we have not the information on which to legislate and fix rates of wages, which we are going to do and attempting to do. We have full information on the question that we will have to face in the future, as we have in the past, strike situations, unless we are going to put something else in the place of them, and we know what those conditions are.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The President has recommended a line of procedure to meet future conditions which he asks us to legislate about; but the committee have concluded to adopt section 6 instead of the line of procedure that the President suggested.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I should like to ask him what to my mind is the practical question in connection with this subject. If we should pass a bill fixing the hours of labor and the pay, and authorizing this commission to make this inquiry, with a provision that these rates should remain in effect until that commission made that inquiry and three months afterwards, does not the Senator believe that would stop the strike on Monday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I think it would stop the strike, but it would not satisfy your constituents and mine. They would hold us responsible.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what I am trying to come to. The questions that are asked prevent my reaching it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me put the two questions together, so that the Senator can answer them together.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know, but the continual asking of questions will never let me get down to the real reason why I want this provision put in.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want the Senator to have them both together, and then he can answer them together.

Mr. THOMAS. There are others waiting for the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator this further question: Does the Senator believe that if we were to pass the bill as it came from the committee with section 6 in it—a section which takes away from the laborers on these interstate roads——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; it takes nothing away from them. It takes something away from capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will withdraw that, then. If we should pass this bill with section 6 in it, authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the hours of labor and the rates of wage, does the Senator believe that we would stand any chance of ending this strike on Monday?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I certainly do. There would be no question about it. The strike is ended to-day, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my judgment that by one course we will avert the strike, while by the other I doubt whether we would avert it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, that is a mere matter of opinion. If the Senator thinks that by passing this eight-hour law to-day we would stop the strike, then if we pass section 6 to-morrow or the next week or three months from now would it not bring on a strike, if that is the case? What has section 6 to do with the controversy involved in this strike? Why should these men strike after they get their rate of wage until the six months' period is out? They have a right to strike at the end of that six months' period anyhow.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator, although I am anxious to conclude my remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I make, if the Senator will pardon me, is that the bill with section 6 in it would be so unsatisfactory to the labor people that I fear it might not prevent the strike.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the men who represent the organized brotherhoods of labor on the railroads are men of intelligence. They are men of high character. They are men of standing. They are men of force of character. To say that those men would go out here and declare a strike against the Government of the United States enacting laws, it seems to me, is an absurd proposition. They might protest against our enacting a law. They might seek to hold you and me responsible for enacting a law; but to say that they would go out and declare a strike, with the accompanying burdens on the American people, because the Congress of the United States enacted some law that did not meet with their approval is an indictment of their intelligence and their integrity.

Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy all this time. I am glad to yield to my brother Senators, but I am anxious to conclude my argument, and I have not yet had an opportunity to state why I believe section 6 ought to be incorporated in this bill.

It is not only the men who are interested in this question of wage; it is the public. The question of railway pay is of vital interest to the man who earns his daily bread as a trainman on these roads. It is of some interest to the stockholder, because it may affect his dividends; but it is a vital question to the industrial life of this Nation. There are a million men in this country directly involved. There are 99,000,000 people who are interested in the great question of uninterrupted transportation of their freight and uninterrupted conduct of their business. These men have a right to a day in court. They have a right to a higher wage if they make out a proper case; but the American people have a right to try to prevent a strike and congested railroad conditions if possible. More than that, the great shipping public is also interested in this wage scale, because if it is put too high it is an unjust burden on their transportation; if it is put too low, it is an injustice to the men who earn their wage in the railroad systems. Do we want to continue the system of arbitrarily submitting this matter to the decision of the two interested parties, with 100,000,000 of American people who have the most at stake entirely left out?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, while I was necessarily absent from the Chamber the Senator may have touched upon what I regard as the absolutely vital point in this section. If he has, then I apologize to him, and I will not insist that he answer my question. But if he has not, then I should like to have him state to me how he expects, under the Constitution and under the laws and under what we all regard as right and proper, that we can attempt to legislate so that any body—the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body—shall have the right to prescribe wages? If they have a right to prescribe wages, of course, they necessarily have a right to say that men must work for those wages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. The second conclusion is all wrong. My friend's first conclusion is right. We are in this bill, for six months or possibly a year, prescribing a wage—not a wage that exists to-day, but a wage that must be paid; no more, no less. The very terms of the eight-hour bill prescribe the rate of wage on these railroads for the next six months or possibly a year.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the Senator's proposition if the men involved refuse to accept that wage?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, if the men involved refuse to accept this wage, they walk out and quit. There is no compulsion here.

Mr. HUGHES. Then why should we not say "recommend" rather than "prescribe"? The Senator is using the language that has been used with reference to a rate which we have a right to enforce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, I think my friend from New Jersey, for whom I have the greatest respect and the greatest consideration, is backing off from this question because it is new.

Mr. HUGHES. No; the language is not new. The language is old, and it is used with reference to something we have a right to enforce.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but I do not care whether you say "make the wage," "prescribe the wage," or "fix the wage." I am not wedded to any particular language in this matter.

Mr. HUGHES. Then we do not differ.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not catching in the bark. I want to bring about a result. The facts do not differ. We prescribe the wage of our employees that we see around here. What rights have they? That page gets his wage fixed by law. If he does not want the job he can quit it, but if he wants to keep the job he must accept the wage that is fixed unless he comes to us and has us refix the amount of the wage. We fix the amount of wage or prescribe the amount of wage for thousands of men in this country, employees of the Federal Government. In fact, the law prescribes our own wages. As it is to-day, the wages on these railroads may be determined by mutual consent of the brotherhoods and the railroad managements in some cases, not in reference to all the employees; but whether that is the case or not, the railroad directors and the railroad presidents in the last anaylsis are prescribing or fixing the wage to-day, and the individual who wants to sit on an engine and run it must accept or reject that wage. That is all he has to do. He can not change it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I have been interested during the very interesting discussion of the Senator to know if this is the beginning of wage fixing either by Congress or through a commission for the employees of railroad companies?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not think this will be the beginning. It will be the end of it, because if section 6 goes in it gives full authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rate of wage for every employee of the railroad from the president down to the trackmen.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; that is precisely what I asked. The commission which is appointed under the bill to serve for a term of six months to gather material, and so forth, I presume is gathering it for some purpose, and the purpose is, I presume, to either have Congress fix the wage or to have some commission fix the wage. So the bill seems to contemplate the proposition that we are entering upon the question of fixing wages for the employees of railroad companies either through an act of Congress, as we are doing to-day, or proposing to do it through some commission such as the Senator from Alabama suggests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. The so-called eight-hour-day wage provision carries us right up to the door, it leads us to the very point, and unless we are going to throw it aside at the end of six months and say we have spent the money for nothing, we at the end of six months will march right up to the door under our own legislation and say we will make this wage permanent and fix it permanently in one way or another or give authority to somebody else to do it. We can not assure the American people any further who is to fix that wage.

Mr. BORAH. And who is going to enforce it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And who is going to enforce it. There is nothing compulsory in the bill.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator who would enforce it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As far as the bill stands to-day, there is no power under the Government of the United States to enforce it except the power of public sentiment, and I think that is all that is necessary. Rather than have a great strike and involve this whole country in a calamity I would go a long ways to prevent it, but I do not believe in marching around the country with a big stick. I do not believe in the mailed fist. I believe in giving the utmost liberty and freedom of action to free men and to persuade them in the interest of their fellow men to act in the interest of their fellow men rather than to compel them.

There is a very persuasive proposition in this bill. If we pass the bill as it is, and the men engaged in railroad work are not satisfied they can strike or they can petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for a higher rate of wage. Which position would they be justified in, in the light of public opinion? When they had a court in which they could file their petition for a higher wage and a fair trial, would public opinion justify them to strike or would public opinion say, "First go to that court of arbitration, that disinterested court, established by the Government, and see if they will not raise the wage." Do you suppose the men who toil on the railroads would justify any of their leaders in carrying them into a strike until they had made the effort to secure their rights by peaceful means?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In just one minute. Do you suppose the public would justify for a minute the carrying on of a strike until they had exhausted their rights by peaceful means? If they carried their appeal into the commission, and the commission heard both sides of the case and found the verdict as to what was fair and just, I believe that would be a final settlement of the case. If in the end it does not turn out, in the light of public opinion, after establishing a fair tribunal for these men, that we can settle this question in that way, then it is time enough for Congress to determine whether it is necessary to put other legislation on the statute books to insure the uninterrupted passage of the commerce of the country. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. I will ask the Senator if he has any objection to the substitution of the word "recommend" for the word "prescribe," in line 19 of section 6, and then to change the paragraph to accord with that amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To whom does the Senator propose the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make recommendation?

Mr. HUGHES. To Congress or the President. The Senator can have his own way about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is a new question. We are wading out into a new field. I think this legislation is absolutely necessary for the industrial peace of the Nation. I have no desire to go too far or too fast. Of course, the Senator from Nevada is in charge of the bill, and, although I prepared section 6, and I am perfectly willing to take the full responsibility for preparing it, I must yield, of course, to the desire and wish of the chairman of the committee; but I will say to my friend from New Jersey that before the passage of the bill he can move an amendment to meet a view that seems to him to be more reasonable and in judgment is less drastic, and, as far as I am individually concerned, I am willing to consent to it, because I merely want to march to a determination of this question by a great tribunal of arbitrament instead of letting it rest where it is to-day, in the courts.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that I am heartily in sympathy with what he has just said, and a day or two ago while we were discussing this matter in a tentative sort of a way I made the suggestion that it would be perfectly in accord with my notion of what is right and proper to have the Interstate Commerce Commission suggest or recommend hours of labor or suggest or recommend rates of wages. I do not know any body of men——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to my friend from New Jersey that the bill will be here an hour or more before it is passed and that when I finish these cursory remarks I would be glad to consult with him and see if we can agree on an amendment, with the consent of the Senator from Nevada, who has charge of the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if I can proceed without interruption just a few minutes, I will close. I say we owe it to the shippers of the country, to the American people, not to leave this legislation in doubt. You can pass this so-called eight-hour-day compromise and say we are coming back here next winter and pass affirmative legislation. You may do it and you may not.

The American people understand this legislative situation just as well as you and I do. We know that this bill is before us for consideration, and we can fix the terms of the future now, if we have a majority in Congress to do it. But we know that if we let it go by without fixing the terms for the future, we may or may not do it when next winter comes. We know that it has then to go through the doubtful passage of committee action, the doubtful question of being reached on the calendar, the doubtful passage of consideration. We all know that it is easier to kill a bill by 95 per cent than the 5 per cent in favor of its passage. I say that when you take the responsibility of making this concession to the men in the brotherhoods to stop this strike, they will get all the advantage of it when the commission comes to fix the wage, because it will be the adopted wage.

If we pass this law and send it to the commission at this time, when the time comes for them to take up the eight-hour day of fixing the wage it will be the adopted eight-hour. It will be the one recognized at that time. It will have all the technical advantage of that situation, whereas, if you do not put that in here, let the 6 or 12 months of the investigation run by, and they are back to the same old fighting ground with the general managers of the railroads on one side of the line and they on the other struggling for what they call their rights.

I say the best security we can give to these railroad men for their rights is to give them a day in an honest court, for they have their power in the courts as well as they have in this Congress. They are a powerful body of intelligent men; they will have their full right there as well as they have had it here. We have progressed to the point now where it is a question of here or there.

But if you pass this legislation increasing arbitrarily the rate without any consideration for the future, abandoning entirely the question of labor disputes, then the great shipping public are going to say to you, where were we represented in this legislation? What opportunity have we had for our rights in considering these questions? But, on the other hand, if we send it to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the same board will fix the rate of wages that fixes the rate for freight they can balance the equation, they can do justice to the men, fairness to the people of the United States, and once for all you will have removed this trouble from the railroad transportation companies of the land, peace and justice and fair play will come to remain with you and stay through the life of the Nation.

Mr. BRADY. I desire to ask the Senator a question relative to the latter part of section 6, on page 6, where it refers to the hours of labor. Commencing at line 4, on page 6, it reads:

> The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, prescribed by it on its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

That is the last paragraph of section 6. The title of the bill reads, "A bill to establish the eight-hour standard workday for interstate transportation, and for other purposes."

Then, commencing in line 3, section 1 reads:

> That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours, in contracts for labor, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

The balance of the section simply refers to what territory is covered. I am interested to know how the committee, or rather the Senators in charge of the bill, construe the words in line 5 of section 6 relative to the hours of labor. There is a positive enactment in the first section of the bill of an eight-hour day as the standard to be used in the contract. As I understand the language of section 6, it means that the passage of this bill transfers to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to change the hours of labor. Is it the understanding of the committee that the bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission can do away with the 8-hour day and put it back to a 10-hour day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator I stated a while ago, I do not know whether he was in the Chamber at the time, that the bill does not fix an eight-hour day. If it did, it would be in effect the legislation already on the statute books in reference to a day's wages. It does not fix an eight-hour day, but it fixes eight hours as a measure of compensation. Undoubtedly when this commission makes its report, the provision in reference to wage is gone. It does not need to be changed. It has gone off the statute books; it no longer exists. The officers and managers of the railroads can change the rate of wages to suit themselves. If we adopt section 6, at the end of that time the commission would have, within the reasonable power that they must stay within the law and within the act, the right to fix the wage up or down.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator does not understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have a legal right to change the eight-hour day as the basis for figuring a day's labor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They might not have the right to change the basis of eight hours, but they would have the right to fix not eight hours as the basis of wages.

The commission would have the right to fix something that is not in the statute and never has been fixed. They would have the right to fix a permanent eight-hour day practically or a permanent ten-hour day or a permanent five-hour day, if it was practicable; I doubt its practicability, because they are piece-workers. But as to the question of changing the rate of wage, the rate of wage is gone when the commission reports under this bill; it is no longer fixed by law; and then the commission would have the right to fix the wage as they saw fit just as the directors of a railroad would have a right to fix it as they saw fit when the commission makes its report and the limitation of the bill is passed.

Mr. BRADY. Personally I favor an eight-hour day, as I understand the Senator from Alabama does, under proper conditions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have always voted for an eight-hour day.

Mr. BRADY. All the men and women in this country who work with their hands have been struggling for an eight-hour day. Unorganized labor has been hoping that the hours of labor may be reduced. Organized labor has been contesting for 30 years for an eight-hour day. Now they seem to have reached the goal, and we are enacting into law what they have been working for during all these years. I am in favor of giving an eight-hour day under proper rules and regulations; but I am not in favor of enacting a bill that on its passage will transfer from Congress the right to change the hours of labor, transferring that power from the United States Senate, a body composed of 96 men, to a body of 7 men composing a commission, in which the laboring men of the United States have at times shown a lack of confidence.

Section 1 of the bill reads:

Eight hours shall be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad.

And then section 6 we give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to change from time to time the hours of labor and put the standard of time for a day's work back to where it was before this law was enacted, or make the hours of toil longer if they are disposed to do so.

I do not believe we should enact legislation that would permit the hours of labor to be fixed or changed by any board or commission. If we pass a law providing for an eight-hour day it should not be changed or amended except by act of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRADY. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is possible that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] did not fully understand the question put by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]; at least, it did not seem to me that he answered it from the point of view, at any rate, that I hold. The Senator from Idaho will notice that in the first line of the proposed measure it is provided that after the 1st of January, "eight hours, in contracts for labor," shall "be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all persons."

It is plain that this part of the bill contemplates a contract between the employee and the employer; and it is declared that in that contract of labor, specifying the hours of labor, eight hours shall be adopted as the basis for compensation; but when the Interstate Commerce Commission takes possession of the subject, if it ever does, and prescribes the hours of labor and the wages, there will be no contract between the employer and the employee, so far as either wages or hours of labor are concerned; and the Senator from Idaho is quite right. The effect of section 6, if it has any, will be to repeal section 1 in that regard, for it substitutes the imperative judgment of the Government with regard to hours of labor and wages for the contracts for labor between the employer and the employee.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from Iowa has given a great deal of study to this subject, and I want to ask him the direct question, Whether or not, in his judgment, the insertion in line 5 of page 6 of the words "the hours of labor" does not give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to put the length of the day back to 10 hours? I believe in the old adage, eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for rest and recreation. If we pass a law naming eight hours as a day's labor, I do not want that law to be changed by any board or commission, and I believe this section does give that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I would like to have the Senator from Iowa express his opinion relative to this matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Assuming that the section is adopted and that it is constitutional—and I have not the least idea that it will be adopted, and I have grave doubts about its constitutionality—it does entirely repeal section 1.

Mr. BRADY. That is my belief. For that reason, Mr. President, I desire at this time to offer an amendment, which reads as follows:

On page 6, in line 5, after the word "the," strike out the words "hours of labor and."

And I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that, whilst I greatly regret to put any Senators to inconvenience, it will be necessary to press the bill to a vote as rapidly as possible, and that I shall urge upon the Senate a continuous session.

Mr. GALLINGER. An evening session?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I make an inquiry, in order to clear the atmosphere a little? We all understand that the other House is now voting upon a bill upon this subject; possibly the vote has been concluded, but I do not know.

Mr. KERN. The bill will be over here about 7 or half past 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is perfectly well understood—I will not say that possibly; but that is my understanding at least—that ultimately we intend to act upon the House bill and not upon the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and reported by him from the committee. We all understand also that the bill which is now being passed by the House has no such provision in it as section 6; that it is merely a plain declaration, such as is contained in sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Senate bill. I am sure there is no disposition upon this side of the Chamber to unduly delay the passage of any measure which our friends upon the Democratic side feel should be passed. There must, of course, be an opportunity given for every Member of the Senate to express his views upon this subject; but I have made some inquiry, and I think that will not require very much time. In view of all this, why should we not wait until we get the bill upon which we intend to act, and then take it up?

Mr. SIMMONS. Such a bill is now before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. We can substitute one bill for the other. Why not, then, go on and save time?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will state, in the first place, there is no such understanding as that to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] refers, that the House bill is to be substituted for this bill. We do not yet know what the House bill is to be. I am told that it has already been amended in several particulars. So we have no understanding upon that score. Of course when the House bill comes over here, we shall give it due consideration; and, if it meets with the approval of the committee, the most expeditious way of disposing of this subject matter will be to pass the House bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, replying to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada about a night session, I merely want to suggest that I hope that proposition will not be pressed. There is no disposition on this side of the Chamber to delay the consideration of this bill. Some of us think it is a bad bill, but responsibility for its passage will ultimately rest with the majority, and if the Senator from Nevada would agree to an early meeting of the Senate to-morrow—say 10 o'clock, if the Senator pleases—I feel sure that there will be no difficulty about reaching a vote on the bill in the afternoon of to-morrow. That certainly will answer every purpose so far as the bill becoming a law to-morrow is concerned.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator from New Hampshire understands that the bill might have to go to conference. Would the Senator agree that we should have a vote on the bill by 2 o'clock on Saturday afternoon?

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel so confident in my own judgment that the bill will not go to conference that I do not take that into account.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not think it is safe to assume that at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a very serious proposition.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, a question. What objection can there be, in view of the anxiety of all of us to proceed to dispose of the business of the Senate, to sitting two or three hours to-night and getting rid of this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have always observed that we make very little progress toward reaching a vote on a bill by holding night sessions, but as I am young, I shall be glad to come here this evening if it is ordered that we shall come.

Mr. STONE. Well, being myself young, I will come also.

Mr. GALLINGER. My own opinion is that we will not make very much progress by a night session. The Senator knows that we rarely ever accomplish anything at such session.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator trust my judgment just once, when I say that if we will stay here to-night we will get rid of this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Possibly that might be so.

Mr. STONE. Just try it once.

Mr. GALLINGER. I dislike exceedingly to question the Senator's judgment, but my impression is that we will not get rid of the bill to-night. However, I am not going to be factious about the matter. Of course, the Senator from Nevada has this matter in charge, and if the Senator from Nevada feels that we ought to have a night session, he has votes enough on the other side of the Chamber to order it, and I think he will not find any factious opposition on this side. I merely made the suggestion from the abundance of experience that we make little progress in calling Senators here in night sessions. That has been my observation in the past, but, as I have said, I shall not raise any factious opposition to any action which the majority think they ought to take.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Could unanimous consent be secured to take a vote on the bill and all amendments at 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. BORAH. It could, provided there is a division of time as to the debate; otherwise not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What would the Senator suggest regarding that?

Mr. BORAH. I would suggest that no Senator be permitted to speak on the bill more than once.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a division of time among all the Senators is absolutely impossible.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it is very easy to limit the time that any Senator shall speak and to provide that he shall speak but once.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would the Senator from Nevada object to taking a recess until 7 o'clock and then coming back at 7 and holding a night session?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I will not object to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not make it 7.30?

Mr. SMOOT. It is only half past 5 now. However, 7.30 would probably be a better hour.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is insistence upon an executive session, and I will suggest that at not later than 6 o'clock we take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is better.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the bill from the House will be here.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill will not come over from the House until about 7.30, and meeting at 8 o'clock will give us plenty of time.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is better. Then I suggest that at the night session the Senator from Nevada might make the suggestion he made a moment ago as to fixing a time for voting on the bill to-morrow; but it ought to be safeguarded along the line suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] by providing that more than one speech shall not be made by any one Senator, and the time to be occupied by each Senator might also be limited.

Mr. THOMAS. A limit of half an hour would give ample time, I think.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let speeches be limited to half an hour.

Mr. BORAH. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will be prepared to make a suggestion at 8 o'clock, when the Senate reassembles.

Mr. GALLINGER. If speeches are limited to half an hour, I think it will give every Senator who desires to speak an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that, in my judgment, it would be well to go on until 9 o'clock to-night and then adjourn until to-morrow under a unanimous-consent agreement as to a time for voting. I think that would be better than to come back here at 8 o'clock and stay until 10 or 11, because when we come back at 8, unless we do stay until 10 or 11, we will not accomplish anything by the night session; but if we continue in session now we will have the House bill by 7 o'clock, and, if not, we will know what is in it; and by 9 o'clock we will have given an opportunity for discussion, and can come back at, say, 10 o'clock in the morning and vote at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have already indicated my assent to a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is the better way.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that at not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17645) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 858) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. At the request of several Senators, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and, under the order previously made, the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) took a recess until this evening at 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6981) to establish the eight-hour standard workday in interstate transportation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no amendment be offered to the bill——

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer as an amendment to the pending bill the bill which has just come from the other House, to strike out all after the enacting clause——

Mr. GALLINGER. That bill is not yet before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada can offer the same matter; necessarily he could not offer the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I said that I offer the matter in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move as an amendment to the pending bill that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and that the matter contained in the bill which has just been received from the other House be substituted therefor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending that motion, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gronna	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Husting	Owen	Smoot
Bryan	Jones	Page	Swanson
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Penrose	Taggart
Chilton	Kern	Pittman	Thomas
Clapp	La Follette	Ransdell	Thompson
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Reed	Underwood
Colt	McCumber	Robinson	Vardaman
Cummins	McLean	Shafroth	Warren
Curtis	Martin, Va.	Sheppard
Dillingham	Myers	Sherman
Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is unavoidably absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Before presenting the motion in regular form, as it should be presented, I ask unanimous consent that the pending unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that upon the handing down of House bill 17700 we proceed to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the bill? We do not know these bills by numbers. Will the Senator read the title?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say that there has just been received from the House the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the pending measure be laid aside temporarily and that the Senate by unanimous consent proceed to consider House bill 17700, which the President pro tempore presents to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to that.

Mr. PITTMAN. That being objected to, I move that the pending bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following language, commencing at line 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send his amendment to the desk and it will be read. In the meantime the Chair lays before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A request has just been made by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] for that very purpose and it was denied. However, it can be submitted again. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the bill first be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad, except railroads independently owned and operated not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railroads, and electric interurban railroads, which is subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in any capacity in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads, except railroads independently owned and operated not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railroads, and electric interurban railroads, from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States: Provided, That the above exceptions shall not apply to railroads though less than 100 miles in length whose principal business is leasing or furnishing terminal or transfer facilities to other railroads, or are themselves engaged in transfers of freight between railroads or between railroads and industrial plants.

SEC. 2. That the President shall appoint a commission of three, which shall observe the operation and effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday as above defined and the facts and conditions affecting the relations between such common carriers and employees during a period of not less than six months nor more than nine months, in the discretion of the commission, and within 30 days thereafter such commission shall report its findings to the President and Congress; that each member of the commission created under the provisions of this act shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the President. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the necessary and proper expenses incurred in connection with the work of such commission, including salaries, per diem, traveling expenses of members and employees, and rent, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books, salaries, and other necessary expenses, the same to be approved by the chairman of said commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That pending the report of the commission herein provided for and for a period of 30 days thereafter the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday.

SEC. 4. That any person violating any provision of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 and not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the pending Senate bill may be laid aside and that the bill just read may be considered without the formality of its reference to the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when that request was made by another Senator I objected. The chairman of the committee having now made it, and the bill having been read, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to state in reference to this bill that I greatly regret that the legislation of Congress is not now about to take the full and complete form hoped for and recommended by the President of the United States in his address. The proposals of the President of the United States were balanced proposals, such balance as any partial carrying out of his recommendations lacks.

The President proposed not only that there should be a temporary recognition of the 8-hour day and the grant of a 10-hour wage for an 8-hour day as a matter of experience and of experiment and of facts ascertained, upon which we could afterwards act, but whilst conceding that legislation to the great forces of the country that have been marshaled in an effort to paralyze its commerce, he on the other side proposed to recognize the just rights of the investors in these properties, who were subjected suddenly, according to their claims, to an increased yearly burden of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000, demanded that the subject should be investigated and determined by voluntary arbitration.

So the President proposed an investigating commission which could ascertain the facts and report them to Congress; and not only that, but that the facts themselves should be laid before the Interstate Commerce Commission and have such influence as they deserved upon their judgment in the matter of the regulation of the rates and the consequent determination of the income of the various companies which were subjected to this additional burden. He yielded to a demand which refused would have resulted in civil war, but at the same time he sought to give the proper guaranty to the great corporations, insistent that they were being subjected to an unjust burden. He thus held the balance even between the two, or as evenly between the two as the circumstances would permit. He did not shrink from the issue of affording the machinery by which this determination could be made. He did not shrink from declaring that action should be taken by the regulating body if the facts warranted. He had the courage to face the shipping and consuming public and to say to them it is possible that this may result in an increased burden upon you, and he did not shirk the issue, as Congress has, by leaving that an undetermined question.

What else, as a matter of balanced legislation, did he urge? The adoption of legislation which would prevent future emergencies of this kind. He proposed that inasmuch as society had never yet secured a means by which reason instead of force should prevail in the determination of contests between capital and labor, between the employers and the employed, thus turning over the employed to the exercise of collective force as their only weapon of defense, society should act upon that question by creating a tribunal which whenever a controversy arose in interstate commerce between employer and employed should ascertain the facts with a view to informing public opinion, that public opinion which always in the end really renders judgment as between these two contending forces. He proposed, and he had the courage to propose, that, whilst that investigation was pending, the privilege to labor to strike and the privilege to the employer to lock out, should be stayed by law until the facts should be laid before the public, who were to sit in judgment, and finally to enter their decree, through that public opinion which finally controls everywhere in the United States. It was perhaps running a risk for him to declare this. The employees, the workers of the country, struggling for years against the traditional powers of employers to control the job, have relied in the conditions of barbarism, which we have permitted to exist, upon the strike as the only weapon of defense. They have been jealous of the maintenance of that defensive weapon, and unwilling to impair in any way its use, realizing that, so long as the present condition of barbarism remains, force alone would ultimately determine the conflict, and that unless they could have a union of forces, the individual laborer was powerless as against the union of capital; and he had the courage, referring to that weapon which the laboring forces of the country had so carefully guarded, to declare that during this period of investigation, and until a report of the facts should be made, the privilege of the strike should be stayed and the strike should be declared unlawful. He had the courage to do that when an election was approaching and when the votes of the workers throughout the country were a matter of serious concern to every candidate.

Mr. President, that was a courageous, and, under the circumstances, a wise proposal; just to all the conflicting interests and the contending interests of society, and bound in the end to result in the substitution of reason for force in the determination of these great controversies. Congress has shirked and will shirk the issue.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Permit me to conclude my statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to conclude my statement, I shall then answer any interrogation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada declines to yield.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, perhaps I am unduly severe in my strictures upon Congress, composed of officeholders who in the next campaign will largely be office seekers, and who do not wish to encounter too serious complications in their campaigns.

It may be that the questions raised were of such magnitude and importance as to require careful consideration, long study, deliberate judgment; and I think it might have been better if I had dwelt upon that phase of the question rather than upon the former; but the fact remains that we are not prepared to meet the issues that Woodrow Wilson is prepared to meet, and the legislation, which this controversy teaches is necessary, must be postponed to another day. God grant that when that day comes we can be as conscious of the perils of the barbarism that prevails to-day in our legislation as we now are; that we will not sink into apathy and inertia, and that in the breathing spell which this truce affords us we can apply our reason and our judgment and our deliberation to some scheme of legislation which will rescue us from that condition of barbarism which afflicts the world internationally through the absence of some tribunal before which contending parties, hot with passion, can be heard, with the power and the capacity and the judgment to so determine questions as to avert resort to force, thus completing the system of law and order which we proudly claim prevails in this the favored country of the world, and which we hope will sometimes prevail as between the struggling nations of the earth. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate with any further debate, as I discussed the question fully this afternoon. The House bill that has been substituted for the Senate bill has no provision in it in reference to arbitration. The Senate bill in section 6 preserved the great system of arbitration in this country in reference to questions of wage by a provision that allowed the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the hours of labor and rates of pay. In order that the matter may be before the Senate for consideration, I offer as an amendment to the House bill section 6 of the Senate bill with a slight modification and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 5. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and determine just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, upon its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened this afternoon with intense interest to everything which was said upon the subject now under discussion, and I was particularly impressed with the remarks which have just been submitted by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee [Mr. NEWLANDS] having the bill in charge.

On Monday last the President, in consultation with the steering committee of the majority of the Senate, submitted a program, which was the next day outlined in the message which he delivered to the joint session of the Congress. It was a program deliberately prepared by the President and his advisers as the best that could be offered to meet the national exigency then impending; and, as the Senator from Nevada has said, it was offered as a program designed to be complete, the component parts of which were to be the basis of such needed legislation as might be speedily accomplished.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] called attention to the preparation and submission by the Department of Justice to the committee of as many bills as were suggested in the message and, of course, designed to be considered and, if possible, recommended for enactment.

It was a matter, Mr. President, of great disappointment to me that the bill submitted by the committee this afternoon practically covered but one of the subjects which the President deemed of so much importance, and that subject one which designates as a sort of yard measure eight hours of time as the basis in contracts for labor and as the standard for reckoning compensation for services.

The bill also contained two other provisions, one of which was designed to prevent, by severe penalties, the willful delay, obstruction, or hindering of the operation of trains on roads mentioned in section 1 of the act, the other to invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with power to fix the hours of labor and prescribe just and reasonable wages; and, Mr. President, it is either that or the briefer House bill, now under consideration, that will probably be enacted if any legislation is to be effected upon this subject within the next 24 hours. I regret, Mr. President, as I have before said, that we are thus confined in our legislation to the consideration of what seems to be a single subject, and that the enactment of a basis for fixing contracts for labor in the future, a very small proportion of the subjects believed by the President to be demanded by the situation now confronting us.

The President, in his message, said:

Having failed to bring the parties to this critical controversy to an accommodation, therefore I turn to you, deeming it clearly our duty as public servants to leave nothing undone that we can do to safeguard the life and interests of the Nation. In the spirit of such a purpose I earnestly recommend the following legislation.

I shall not detain the Senate by reading the program which the President then outlined. With that the Senate is familiar; but he continued:

There is one other thing we should do if we are true champions of arbitration. We should make all arbitral awards judgments by record of a court of law in order that their interpretation and enforcement may lie, not with one of the parties to the arbitration, but with an impartial and authoritative tribunal.

These things I urge upon you, not in haste or merely as a means of meeting a present emergency, but as permanent and necessary additions to the law of the land, suggested, indeed, by circumstances we had hoped never to see, but imperative as well as just, if such emergencies are to be prevented in the future. I feel that no extended argument is needed to commend them to your favorable consideration. They demonstrate themselves. The time and the occasion only give emphasis to their importance. We need them now and we shall continue to need them.

Mr. President, if the estimate of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] of the bill reported by the committee of which he is a member be correct, it can be considered as a mere temporary measure only, and designed to avoid for the time being the crisis now threatening the industries of the entire Nation, and practically expiring by the limitation of nine months or thereabout upon it. If that be true—and I am not prepared to say it is not true, although my reading of the bill would lead me to a somewhat different conclusion—then the fact remains that not a single recommendation of the President has been reported for the consideration of the Senate, but that a temporary measure having some of the features of one of them is before us for consideration.

Mr. President, if that be so, and we now pass nothing but an eight-hour provision, we may be reproached with legislating to tide a great crisis over a presidential election upon the assumption that the interval will be utilized by Members of Congress in the investigation of all subjects connected with the situation, to the end that before the period shall have expired other and more permanent and intelligible legislation will be placed upon the statute books. I hope that may be so, because I shall, as a matter of course, join with my associates in whatever legislation may by the majority be deemed essential for this time. But I apprehend that we shall do nothing further until again compelled to do so.

I can not avoid referring here to another subject discussed by the Senator from Alabama, and I think also referred to by the Senator from Nevada—that this legislation was demanded by certain great labor organizations as the alternative of a strike called for next Monday, which would involve the entire transportation system of the Nation in its scope, thereby paralyzing by temporarily suspending the industrial energies of the Nation. Assuming that to be true, Mr. President, I believe it must be said that this is the first time that the Congress of the United States is legislating in pursuance of a semipublic bargain upon a great subject of widespread and national concern; and I greatly fear, if that be so, unless the legislation thus demanded is coupled with sanctions and guaranties that will make it effective, it may become, and that in the near future, a precedent for similar demands coming from other directions to which we must also yield for the same reasons, only again to postpone the day of the final wrath to come. That, Mr. President, is not wisdom; it is not statesmanship; it is not common sense; and, above all, it is not the proper discharge of the duties of the legislators of the people to the constituencies which sent them here.

I think, therefore, that the stricture of the Senator from Nevada is correct, that it is the Congress and not the President of the United States which is disposed at this time. I will not say to surrender to omnious demands, but to evade the tremendous responsibilities which we assumed with our election, and which in times of crisis above all others we should meet, and meet like men, without regard to consequences as to individuals or individual ambitions. I very much fear, too, that after this danger shall have passed away we will lapse into that same condition of indifference to which all men are prone in times of quiet and peaceful contentment.

I recall that last May the Senator from Nevada, in the discharge of his duty, fearful that this identical situation would be evolved from conditions then quite apparent, urged upon the attention of this body the necessity of adopting some anticipatory legislation which would enable us to meet, if indeed it would not avoid, the contingencies which then threatened, and which now justify the position which he then assumed. But,

Mr. President, we are a hopeful, optimistic people, and Members of Congress do not in that respect differ from other individuals. So, some of us listened to him and then went our way, indulging the hope, if not the assumption, that time in its evolutions would bring the subject to a satisfactory solution, and thereby make it unnecessary for us to exert ourselves concerning it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, although I do not intend to speak very long, and I therefore hope I will not be interrupted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator yields.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I will not interrupt the Senator if he is not going to talk long.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield to the Senator, but I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate long.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is assuming that this is the only bill which is to be brought before this Congress touching this subject matter.

Mr. THOMAS. No; not the Congress but the session.

Mr. BORAH. Well, during this session. Do I understand that this is the only measure touching this entire subject matter which we are going to be called upon to consider at this session?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, Mr. President, I am unable to answer that, as I am not a member of the committee. I know of no other bill.

Mr. BORAH. Why should the Senator from Colorado be so gloomy over the situation? Perhaps we will have another bill in here Monday to cover this exact situation.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will assure me that it is the intention to bring in such a bill, I shall be very glad to know it.

Mr. BORAH. I assumed that it would hardly be practicable to put all these different measures in one bill, and that it was likely that we would be called upon to consider other measures covering different phases of the President's message.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, we have passed a number of bills during this session which comprise a vastly greater number of subjects than those to which the President's message called attention. Indeed, it is becoming the custom, and not the exception, to embody in our supply bills practically all subjects of legislation coming within the constantly increasing jurisdiction of the Federal Congress. I think we would have ample time to consider the various subjects, interrelated and interwoven with each other, had they been brought at this time to the attention of Congress.

So much, however, for what my friend is pleased to call a gloomy view of the situation.

Now, Mr. President, I presume that if the Congress has the power which it has recently asserted to declare what class of persons may be permitted to manufacture goods entering into interstate commerce, it also has the right to legislate with regard to what shall be a day's labor and what shall be the compensation for that day's labor, in so far as matters of interstate commerce are concerned. To my mind, however, it is the exercise of a very dangerous authority, if, indeed, it exists at all, because the power to fix a day's labor at 8 hours necessarily carries with it the power to fix it at 16 hours, and the power to require the wages now paid for 10 hours to be applied to 8 hours carries with it also the power to require men to work 16 hours for 8 hours' wages. In a country like ours, where the shifting currents of public opinion which always control public action are first in one direction and then in another, precedents resorted to in crises or occasionally may, even in the near future, rise to plague those who invoked their exercise.

We know, Mr. President, that first one and then another political party controls the affairs of this Republic; that they come and go because of the rise and the fall of policies and of principles through the operation of those tremendous forces which constitute the driving power in legislation, and ever resorting to precedents for the accomplishment of their purposes. So that I am not at all sure that, even granting the existence of such an authority, it is the part of wisdom and of caution to resort to it too hastily. But here, since it is the alternative to a condition which we must avoid, and since the trend of legislation is constantly in the direction of an extension of Federal authority, we may be pardoned for resolving the doubt in favor of what seems to be the general demand and of acting accordingly.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that that provision of section 3 of the Senate bill which prohibits, under penalties, interference with the operation of trains moving in interstate commerce should go with this legislation, so that there shall be some sanction in the law giving assurance to the public that the grant of the concession will permanently tend to end the difficulty. Much has been said here about compulsory arbitration, in which I do not believe. Indeed, it has always seemed to me to be a contradiction in terms, since arbitration as distinguished from litigation is generally the result of consent and of mutual agreement as distinguished from compulsion. But certainly compulsory arbitration is no more undesirable than compulsory legislation; yet we are now engaged in passing an act of compulsory legislation, which to become effective and which without such compulsion, as I have said, should carry with it some requirements which guarantees the security of the future.

Mr. President, it is an undeniable fact that in the United States, on the one hand, great, overshadowing and far-reaching combinations, dominating all human energies, have been allowed to come into existence, to develop, and to reach their present enormous proportions; on the other hand, labor unions, from small beginnings, have developed and expanded until they, too, spread over the surface of the continent; and the differences frequently arising between the two—as the employer and the employed—are assuming national proportions and becoming vast national issues, forcing all other issues, however important, aside and concentrating the attention of thoughtful men upon the consequences involved in the threatened final and irreconcilable disagreement between the two. These huge Frankensteins, now practically beyond the control of the Government, now confront each other upon an issue in which one demands much and the other concedes nothing, and are about to grapple, thus involving not only the industries of the country but the very peace if not the foundations of society, require that the Government, in legislation of this kind, when making concessions should also arm the President and the other authorities with power to determine, for the peace and welfare of society, how these questions shall be settled and the extent to which the settlement shall be enforced.

It may be said that this is impossible regardless of the nature of legislation or the care and deliberation with which it may be conceived and enacted; but to my mind it is the supreme question of modern politics in America. It is the one great issue of this as it may be of the next generation, whether modern combinations are stronger than the Government; whether the Government is unwilling or unable to discharge the responsibilities which these new conditions place upon it. To my mind there is but one solution of this tremendous problem beyond that of a resort to force, which I trust in God may never be necessary. Mr. President, my experience is that when the sober second thought of the average citizen takes possession of him, and he reviews and realizes the consequences of extremes and feels his sense of responsibility to his country and the interest which he has in it, I can well entertain the hope that there never will be other than a peaceful solution of these differences, however imminent or menacing they may at times appear.

Mr. President, I have said that I believed there was but one solution of this sinister problem. I do not think it can be found in section 6 of the Senate bill—so ably championed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—because, although we give to the Interstate Commerce Commission all the power and all the jurisdiction contemplated by that section there is lacking the element essential to the enforcement of its decrees. The power of the courts in the last resort, Mr. President, is the armed force of the country. The commission is not a court, although sometimes exercising quasi judicial powers. This section does not pretend in any manner, not in the slightest degree, to determine how or in what manner the orders that are to be made under it, if jurisdiction were extended to that tribunal, may be enforced, and their various details observed.

Mr. President, in this connection I am justified in again reminding the Senate that this situation is the outgrowth—the logical outgrowth, the necessary outgrowth—of the original surrender to private hands by the people of the United States of the great business of transportation.

The Senator from Alabama very justly called attention to the absolute dependence of our economic and social life upon the great systems of transportation. He well likened our arteries of commerce to those of the human system and spoke truly when he said that death ensued from any serious interruption of the circulation of either. And yet, Mr. President, because of the surrender of this great public agency into private hands, five or six men now controlling it may stand between the acceptance of an offer of compromise and the welfare and the well-being of 100,000,000 people.

Mr. President, no such power in any other country was ever delegated to a few private citizens. No other country would permit a great element of government to be used for selfish purposes as it has been so constantly used here. Those clothed with it in America have manipulated it in amassing colossal fortunes, in emitting huge volumes of fictitious wealth in the shape of watered stock, and in wresting compensation from the consumers, that profit may be realized upon a so-called capital having no basis more substantial than the circumambient air.

We will avoid troubles like that we now consider only when the Nation reasserts its power and control over its lines of transportation, these huge arteries of commerce, these absolutely essential systems without which our national life is impossible. When these brotherhoods become the employees of the Nation, subject to its laws and to its orders, the people will be freed from the menace of starvation, suffering, misery, and disorder which flow from the clash of private interests, which can not be reconciled by peaceful methods.

On the first day of the present session of Congress I introduced for the accomplishment of this purpose Senate bill 18, entitled "A bill to provide for the establishment of Federal railroad companies, to establish a more effective supervision of railroads in the United States, and for other purposes," prepared by one of the most noted lawyers of America, a lawyer and a gentleman who has given profound thought to the subject, who has for years been the legal representative of some of the great corporations of the country, whose reflections and experience long ago warned him that the one solution of the problem of transportation, the one method of arriving at a settlement of the differences which are bound to arise between great combinations of men and great combinations of capital when engaged in a great public service, was in a modified but complete governmental control. He proposed to use as the basis of his scheme the Federal bank system, providing for the division of the country into districts and the establishment in each of them of a Federal corporation, taking over all the roads within their respective boundaries, the majority of the stock in which should be owned by the Government, and the control of which should be in boards of directors, a majority of whom would represent that interest. I shall ask that this bill be printed as a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, without objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 18) to provide for the establishment of Federal railroad companies, to establish a more effective supervision of railroads in the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever the words "Federal railroad company" are used in this act the words shall be construed to refer to each of the five corporations to be organized under this act as herein provided.

The words "Federal railroad board" used in this act shall be construed to mean the board of six members herein provided for.

The words "Federal railroad board" used in this act shall be construed to be the head, at the seat of government, of an executive department to be known as the department of railroads, said head to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said appointee shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, and his term and tenure of office shall be uniform with other members of the Cabinet.

FEDERAL RAILROAD DISTRICTS.

SEC. 2. That continental United States, excluding Alaska, is hereby divided into five districts, to be known as New England railroad district, central railroad district, southern railroad district, northwestern railroad district, and central Pacific railroad district.

The New England railroad district shall include the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad system and all other railroads in New England not controlled by any railroad system in another Federal railroad district.

The central railroad district shall include the Pennsylvania Railroad system, New York Central Railroad system, Erie Railroad system, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad system, Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad system, and all other railroads in the States of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York not controlled by any railroad system in another Federal railroad district.

The southern railroad district shall include the Southern Railroad system and Illinois Central Railroad system, and all other railroads in the States of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Mississippi, and the District of Columbia not controlled by any railroad system in another Federal railroad district.

The northwestern railroad district shall include the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad system; the Chicago & North Western Railroad system; the Northern Pacific Railroad system; the Great Northern Railroad system; and all other railroads in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington not controlled by any railroad system in another Federal railroad district.

The central Pacific railroad district shall include the Union Pacific Railroad system; the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad system; the Southern Pacific Railroad system; and all other railroads in the States of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, Oklahoma, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, and California not controlled by any railroad system in another Federal railroad district.

Any question which may arise as to whether a particular railroad is included within any particular Federal railroad district shall be decided by the Federal railroad board.

FEDERAL RAILROAD COMPANIES.

SEC. 3. That the Federal railroad board shall supervise the organization in each of the said districts of a Federal railroad company by nine individuals in each district selected by the Federal railroad board, and thereupon such individuals in each district shall, under their seals, make an organization certificate which shall specifically state the name of such Federal railroad company, the territory, and extent of the district, as defined by State in section 2 of this act; the city and State in which its principal office is to be located in said district, the amount of capital stock ($9,000), and the number of shares into which the same is divided ($10 each), and the number of shares subscribed for by each incorporator (100). The said organization certificate shall be acknowledged before a judge of some court of record or notary public; and shall be, together with the acknowledgment thereof, authenticated by the seal of said court or notary, transmitted to the secretary of railroads, who shall file, record, and preserve the same in his office. Upon the filing of such certificates with the secretary of railroads, as aforesaid, each of the said Federal railroad companies shall become a body corporate, and as such and in the name designated in such organization certificate shall have power—

First. To adopt and use a corporate seal; to have succession in perpetuity, unless it is sooner dissolved by an act of Congress, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law; to make contracts; to sue and to be sued in any court of law or equity; to appoint by its board of directors such officers and employees as are not otherwise provided for in this act, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalty thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers or employees; to prescribe by its board of directors by-laws, not inconsistent with law, regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted, and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed; to exercise such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Second. To acquire, hold, and exercise the power of ownership of any or all of the shares of the capital stock and bonds and other obligations of any or all railroad companies within its district as aforesaid; also to construct, acquire, maintain, and operate railroads within its district; also to issue shares of its capital stock from time to time, either for cash or in exchange for shares of stock or bonds or other obligations of any and all railroad corporations within its district, on such basis of exchange as may be authorized by its board of directors; also to issue shares of its capital stock from time to time for such purposes (including its own expenses and disbursements) connected with or incidental to the control, acquisition, construction, management, use, and development of railroads, railroad business, and railroad stocks, bonds, or other obligations already issued or hereafter to be issued by railroad companies within its district (including the issue of Federal railroad company stock, to provide money to enable any railroad company in its district to pay or purchase outstanding obligations or to pay for past or future improvements, equipment, or extensions, stock of such railroad company being issued to the Federal railroad company in consideration of such money), as may be determined by its board of directors; also to exercise the power, which is hereby given to it, of eminent domain, to acquire any shares of the capital stock of any and all railroad corporations within its district or to acquire any railroads themselves or railroad property or property for railroad purposes, in its district, whenever in its opinion it is necessary or advantageous to it to do so by condemnation under judicial process, and the United States district court or courts of the district wherein such stock or property is located shall have jurisdiction of proceedings for such condemnation. The practice, pleadings, forms, and modes of proceedings in causes arising under the provisions of this act shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, forms, and proceedings existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such district courts are held, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

Third. To vote its own holdings of stock and to solicit proxies from other stockholders to vote their holdings of stock in any railroad corporation in its district, and such vote of such stock and proxies by the Federal railroad company for directors in said railroad corporation or corporations shall be limited to persons who shall have resided within the district for at least nine months in each of the five years prior to the election, and have been actively engaged during said five years in the district in commerce, agriculture, or some other industrial pursuit, or in the practice of a profession.

SEC. 4. At least six members of the board of directors of each Federal railroad company shall for at least nine months of each of the preceding two years have resided in the district in which he is chosen director. No Senator or Representative in Congress shall be an officer or director of a Federal railroad company. No director of a Federal railroad company shall be an officer, director, or employee of any railroad company. Any director of any Federal railroad company may be removed at any time for cause by the Federal railroad board. The board of directors of each Federal railroad company shall consist of nine members, three of whom shall be designated by the Federal railroad board and six of whom shall be selected by the stockholders of the Federal railroad company in meeting assembled. The first board of directors shall consist of the nine incorporators and shall hold office for six months after incorporation. Voting by proxy at an election of a Federal railroad company shall be allowed, but all proxies shall run to and be voted by the Federal railroad board free from instructions in voting such stock. The stock shall be voted as follows: The owner of 10 shares or less shall have 1 vote; the owner of from 10 to and including 49 shares shall have 2 votes; the owner of from 49 to and including 100 shares shall have 3 votes; the owner of from 100 to and including 200 shares shall have 4 votes; the owner of over 200 shares shall have 5 votes and no more. The directors of each Federal railroad company shall receive such compensation as the board of directors may determine in advance in each instance, subject to the approval of the Federal railroad board. The board of directors of each Federal railroad company shall at its first meeting (after its first board retires from office) designate three directors to serve one year from the next first day of January, and three for two years, and three for three years (one of the three directors named by the Federal railroad board to be in each class), and thereafter all directors shall hold office for three years. Vacancies in the board shall be filled by the remaining directors. Each Federal railroad company shall every three months make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress.

STOCK ISSUES AND GUARANTY OF DIVIDENDS.

SEC. 5. That the capital stock of each Federal railroad company shall be divided into shares of $10 each. The outstanding capital stock may be increased from time to time as authorized by the board of directors. When the capital stock of any Federal railroad company shall have been increased the board of directors shall cause to be executed a certificate to the Comptroller of the Currency showing the increase of capital stock. The shares shall be represented by certificates, which shall be transferable.

SEC. 6. That dividends on the stock of each Federal railroad company shall not exceed an amount fixed for each issue when made, such amount being the amount of dividend guaranteed by the United States Government as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 7. That the United States Government hereby guarantees the payment of dividends on the shares of the stock of the several Federal railroad companies to the amounts specified on the certificates for said stock as originally authorized by the board of directors of the particular Federal railroad company, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sign the name of the United States of America to a guaranty to that effect on the face of the certificates of stock issued by the corporation (the guaranty on canceled certificates to be canceled when the certificates are canceled by transfer), the form of said guaranty to be as follows (the rate of dividend guaranteed being filled in in each instance):

"The United States of America hereby guarantees to the record holder of this certificate of stock the payment by the Federal railroad company issuing the same — per cent annual dividends on the shares of the capital stock represented by this certificate, payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July of each year after the date of this guaranty."

If at any time the United States of America by act of Congress ceases to pay said guaranty, the United States of America shall pay to the holders of said certificates of stock the price at which they were originally issued or the value at the time of issue of the property for which they were originally issued.

SEC. 8. That the United States Government shall be entitled to all the profits of the several Federal railroad companies in excess of said guaranteed dividends, and shall apply such excess profits to extensions and improvements, or purchase of railroad bonds or stock, or reduction of rates, or retirement of stock issued hereunder, or for any other pupose said Government may deem best in connection with the railroads.

SEC. 9. That national banks and Federal reserve banks may invest and deal in the shares of stock of the said Federal railroad companies, or any of them, and such shares may be transferred to and deposited with the Treasurer of the United States in lieu of United States bonds as prescribed by sections 5159 to 5189, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended, and by section 4, subdivision 8, of the Federal reserve act, and may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for deposits by said Treasurer of funds of the United States in national banks, and may be deposited as security for and in accordance with the act of Congress of May 30, 1908, amending the national banking laws. The board of trustees established by act of Congress of June 25, 1910, to establish postal savings depositories may invest postal savings funds in such shares as securities of the United States within the meaning of that act. Said shares of the capital stock of said Federal railroad companies, or any of them, shall be receivable at par as a satisfactory collateral security for Federal reserve notes and as a reserve available as eligible paper under the Federal reserve act, and as investments by Federal reserve banks. Said Federal railroad companies, their stock and property, and the income to their stockholders from the guaranteed dividends, shall be exempt from Federal, State, and local taxation and license fees.

SEC. 10. That the Federal railroad companies shall proceed with all reasonable dispatch to acquire sufficient of the outstanding capital stock of the Pennsylvania; New York Central; Illinois Central; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago & North Western; Union Pacific; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; and Southern Pacific Railroad systems to control those railroad companies; each Federal railroad company so to acquire the stock of any of said railroad system or systems within its district. Such acquisition may be by purchase or by exchange of Federal railroad company's stock for the stock of said railroad system or systems or by condemnation proceedings.

FEDERAL RAILROAD BOARD.

SEC. 11. That a Federal railroad board is hereby created, which shall consist of six members, one to be the secretary of railroads and the remaining five members to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the said five members of the Federal railroad board not more than one shall be selected from any one Federal railroad district. The said five members shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal railroad board, and shall each receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary traveling expenses. No Senator or Representative in Congress shall, during his term of office, or for five years thereafter, be a member of the Federal railroad board. The members of the said board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any railroad company, and shall not, during that time, hold or own stock therein. At least one of said five members shall be a person experienced in the management and operation of railroads. One member shall be designated by the President to serve for 2 years, one for 4, one for 6, one for 8, and one for 10 years, and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of 10 years unless sooner removed for cause by the President. Whenever a vacancy shall occur, whether by expiration of term or otherwise, among the said five members of the Federal railroad board a successor shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill such vacancy. The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may occur on the Federal railroad board during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire 30 days after the next session of the Senate convenes. Of the five members thus appointed one shall be designated by the President as governor and one as vice governor of the Federal railroad board. The governor of the Federal railroad board, subject to its supervision, shall be the active executive officer. A majority of the members at a meeting duly called shall constitute a quorum, and a majority of those present at such meeting shall be sufficient for affirmative action. The salaries and expenses of the Federal railroad board shall be paid by the Federal railroad companies in proportion to the respective outstanding capital stock of each from time to time. The Federal railroad board shall annually make a full report of its operations to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall cause the same to be printed for the information of the Congress. The Federal railroad board shall have power to examine at its discretion the accounts, books, and affairs of each Federal railroad company and to require such statements and reports as it may deem necessary, and shall at all times furnish full information to the public regarding its operations and the operations of each Federal railroad company.

SEC. 12. That said Federal railroad board is hereby given the power to fix and determine all interstate railroad rates and service and also such intrastate rates and service as Congress has power to regulate under the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 13. That no stock shall be issued by any Federal railroad company except after the approval thereof by the Federal railroad board, which board shall also first approve the use to be made of such stock and the terms of its issue. All financial operations of every Federal railroad company shall be approved by the Federal railroad board before becoming effective.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate longer. I know there are many things to be discussed before we reach a vote upon this measure. I know that other Senators who have considered the subject far more profoundly than I must give us the benefit of their experiences and their knowledge. I shall therefore yield the floor, with the reiteration that whatever may be the form of this bill, however it may fail to meet my view of what its requirements should be, I shall feel bound under the circumstances and the situation to cast my vote for its enactment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the immediate question is, I assume, the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. In opposing the adoption of the amendment it must not be understood that I am in favor of the bill even though the amendment be rejected.

But there is a curious situation just before us that it is worth while to consider for a moment, and it is this: The Senator from Alabama stated this afternoon very clearly and very frankly that he regarded the bill as it now comes from the House as indefensible. It is practically the bill that was reported by the committee of the Senate with the exemption of the amendment which the Senator from Alabama now offers. He was very emphatic with respect to his opinion upon the general merits of the bill. His only reason, and in that I know he is joined by the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, possibly by some on this side of the Chamber, for supporting or advocating the proposal in the bill is that a great calamity is about to fall on the people of the United States, and that we must surrender our views with respect to the propriety of such legislation in order to protect the people of the United States from the most appalling disaster with which they were ever threatened.

The reason is a persuasive one. I am not prepared to say that a Senator ought not to yield much of his opinion in order to accomplish so desirable an object, although for myself it is impossible for me to believe that the consequences with which we are threatened ought to be prevented in the way proposed in the legislation of the House or in the legislation proposed by the committee of the Senate. However that may be, the Senator from Alabama now offers an amendment to the House bill which, if adopted, will, in my judgment, destroy the object of the bill and the reasons which he gave for supporting the bill.

I should like to know whether the Senator from Alabama or any other Senator in the Chamber has any reason to believe that if the amendment proposed by him is adopted by the Senate and becomes a part of the law the executives of the brotherhoods, who alone have the power to avert the threatened strike, will act? I want to know whether he is of the opinion that they will send the telegram or telegrams which yesterday in the hearing before the committee we were advised must be sent in order to prevent the general suspension of traffic at 7 o'clock Monday morning?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator is of that opinion, I will be very glad to know it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. I am of the opinion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa declines to yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. I have only an inference to justify it, but I am of the opinion that these brotherhoods will not regard the legislation with the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Alabama as a satisfactory settlement of the dispute. I yield now to the Senator from Alabama for a question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator, but he seemed to be asking me a question, and I rose for that purpose. I answered that question this afternoon. Probably the Senator was not present at the time. I stated then, and I will state again, that I regard the leaders of the brotherhood of trainmen who represent those men here to be men of character and intelligence. When the Senator asks me if I think men of both character and intelligence would order their men to strike or would withhold an order to keep them from striking because the Congress of the United States passed legislation that they did not like, I must say that I think that is an attack on the intelligence and patriotism of those men.

Of course, they were in a combat with the managers of the railroads. They were making a battle for an increased wage. They did not bring this question to Congress. They did not bring this question to Washington. They were battling in New York, and the question of the Government was not connected with it. The President, in my judgment, very properly endeavored to pacify and ameliorate the situation, and he brought them here. He was unable to succeed, but he did, I am told, secure an understanding with these men that they would withhold their strike order on one condition, and that is that this eight-hour system as a method of raising wages if not agreed to by the railroad companies should be temporarily written into law. Now, if we write it into law it is the same thing as the railroad companies agreeing to it for the six or seven months it is operative, and they have got nothing to go to the country on, nothing to go to their men on.

As to any other legislation that Congress would pass, to say that the intelligent men at the head of these great organizations would order a strike and tie up the great transportation systems of the United States for the purpose of compelling legislation from Congress in their interests, not to settle a dispute that they had brought on as to wages, but to force legislation out of the Congress of the United States by such an act, in my judgment would be nothing short of treason to their country and their flag, and they are too intelligent a set of men to engage in any such proposition, in my judgment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have known the chiefs of these four brotherhoods for many years, and I have always regarded, and regard it now, as a high honor to reckon them among my friends. They are all intelligent; they are all patriotic. But the Senator from Alabama and all the Senators here must not forget the genesis and the development of this legislation. It is true that these executives of the brotherhoods have not appealed to Congress. They ask nothing of Congress. In my judgment, they came before the President of the United States against their will and because the invitation of a sovereign is always a command. In my judgment they were very reluctant to see the question propounded in Congress at all, and I entirely acquit them of any motive or intent whatsoever to coerce Congress in the least degree. I am as assured as the Senator from Alabama can possibly be that they will discharge what they regard to be their duty without any respect to consequences. Let us see. The President of the United States——

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator proceeds with that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Iowa says that the representatives of the brotherhood are asking nothing of Congress. In one sense, and technically, perhaps, that is true. But it is known that Congress is legislating here to-night without opportunity to consider and reflect upon the subject matter upon which we are called to vote, and without an opportunity to investigate, for the reason that these men propose to inflict a terrible calamity upon the country if we take the time essential for an intelligent opinion upon this subject. They say to us "unless you legislate by 12 o'clock Saturday night we will involve the country in a calamity. We will not give you an opportunity, which is ordinarily exercised by independent legislators, to determine whether or not we are right. We determine that, and you will legislate or we will inflict this calamity upon the country."

You may say that that is not a threat. I regard it as a threat and I regard that the legislature of this great country sitting here is not legislating according to its own will and according to its own judgment, but by reason of and because of dictation outside of this Chamber. We are not passing legislation of which we have made investigation. We are even told here we can not amend the bill, because it will not meet with their approval; we are mere automatons; we are mere registrars of decrees formulated by others!

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Iowa kindly suspend until the Senator from Missouri——

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire first to answer the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has a right to submit a parliamentary inquiry, and that is the purpose for which he has risen.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. REED. I do not make this inquiry for the purpose of having any ruling enforced against the Senator from Iowa, but I desire to inquire of the Chair if at present the rule is in effect that when a Senator permits himself to be interrupted for a speech he thereby loses the floor. I do not desire to enforce it against the Senator from Iowa, but if that rule still exists I shall ask that it be enforced hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is very glad the Senator from Missouri submitted the inquiry. The present occupant of the chair understands that that is not a question which the Chair can decide. The question whether or not a Senator has forfeited the floor by an interruption is for the Senate to decide. It was settled on a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate that the Chair can not interfere as to the time and character of the interruption a Senator will submit to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Idaho for a question. I did not anticipate the injection into the argument I was making of the view which he has expressed. I do not share that view. I do not believe that the brotherhoods of trainmen are attempting to coerce the Congress of the United States. I am not attempting to defend them in their declaration for a strike. That is their business and they must take the consequences of their action. I think they ought to have postponed the strike until the questions at issue between them and the railway companies could have been fairly and impartially examined. They chose not to do so; and the responsibility for their action lies with them and with the men whom they represent; but they have not asked Congress for legislation; they have not attempted to direct the course of legislation in Congress, if I understand the manner in which the whole subject was developed. I was about to state that when interrupted by the Senator from Idaho.

The President called both parties to the dispute before him. Concerning the wisdom of doing so, I have nothing whatsoever to say; I leave it to his friends upon the other side of the Chamber to eulogize what they believe to be his courage, which, however, may admit of differing opinions. Nevertheless, after examining the dispute he finally made a proposal to the brotherhoods and to the railways. The brotherhoods accepted his proposal. I will not now examine into its merits. The railways rejected his proposal. Thereupon, so far as mediation was concerned, the usefulness of the President of the United States was at an end; and the brotherhoods, wisely or unwisely—I think unwisely—ordered a strike. I am frank to say that I believe in sending to the country the call for a strike among 400,000 employees of the railroads, upon whom we depend just as essentially as we depend upon the atmosphere that we breathe, they have inflicted the severest blow that has ever been laid upon organized labor, as well as the severest blow that could be possibly inflicted upon the innocent people who must bear the consequences of this interruption of commerce. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] However, I am not here to review their discretion in this respect, nor do I believe that this legislation should be measured or weighed or analyzed in the light of their discretion or indiscretion in ordering or in concluding that the railway trainmen of the United States shall strke on the 4th day of September.

What then? The President, having failed of mediation, came to Congress. I am not intending to criticize him for a moment for coming to Congress; I am not even going to pause to suggest how he came to Congress; but I am assuming that he came in a perfectly proper way, and, so far as I am concerned, I think he ought to have come to Congress at that time. He recommended a program of legislation which was perfectly understandable by all intelligent men.

The first element in that program was the proposal which he had made to the men and to the railways, which the men had accepted, but which the railways had refused. The second element in that program, and the only other one that I need to consider, was an amendment to our law to take away for a period the right of organized men to strike in concert and by prearrangement. These were the two essentially important things recommended by the President to Congress, and we are considering these things not at the demand of either the union men in the train service of the United States or at the demand of the railways of the United States, but we are considering these things at the demand or under the recommendation of the President of the United States.

The President may have been courageous—and I have no inclination to withdraw from the eminent gentleman who occupies the office of Chief Executive of the Nation any credit for courage or wisdom—but when we are remembering or recalling the beautiful tones of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] as he uttered his eulogy upon his chief it must also be remembered that one of the propositions of the President pleased the brotherhood men; the other proposition pleased the railways; and there was here—possibly properly so—a fair, even balance in the distribution of his favor. But when this was done—when the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate met—these four chiefs appeared before us, not upon their own suggestion but upon our invitation, just as the railway companies appeared upon our invitation and a somewhat meager representation of that vague and indefinite body known as the public appeared before us.

The four brotherhood chiefs stated, without any reluctance, without any hesitation, with the utmost candor, that there was just one way in which the strike which had been called for the morning of September 4 could be averted. It was that they send to their subordinates, the heads of the various unions throughout the country, a message in these terms: "Satisfactory conclusion reached." They declared that if the bill which represented the proposal of the President, and which they had theretofore accepted, and which the railways had refused, was enacted into law they could send that telegram; otherwise they could not and would not. Now, criticize them if you will. I am not entering upon that phase of the matter; but those on the other side who believe that we ought to pass this bill in order to avert a strike, who believe that we ought to pass it because it is satisfactory to the union men, and that upon its passage the telegram which I have mentioned will be sent and the strike averted, had better pause and inquire whether, if the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is added to the bill, that telegram will be sent.

I do not represent them; I have no authority to speak for them, although possibly I have a better opportunity to know how they feel about the amendment than some Senators; but it is my judgment that, if their right to collective bargaining is ever taken away by clothing the Interstate Commerce Commission with the authority to fix their wages and their hours of labor, they will not send the telegram. I am just stating these things to those who are intending to vote for this bill, and who are intending to vote for it for no other reason than that it will avert the strike. It seems to me that they ought to know, if that is the ground upon which they are proceeding, that when they pass the bill the object will be accomplished.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment without any regard to the effect it might have upon the strike. I am opposed to it because, if adopted, in my judgment it marks the end of our experiment of regulating commerce among the States. It will deprive the 1,800,000 men who are operating our railways in all the various capacities in which men work of the right to bargain and contract; it will take away from all the unions into which railway men are organized the privilege, which they have won through long years of contest, of collective bargaining.

Collective bargaining, Mr. President, is the chief characteristic of the labor union. It is the purpose for which the labor union is organized, the best and the noblest purpose, at least, for which the labor union is organized. It is intended that through collective bargaining there may be produced some equality of condition and situation when they come to contract, to deal with their employer. But it will also take away from the railway companies all their independence, and it will leave them with the power to destroy, if you please, but not the power to protect. It will leave them irresponsible in their management. If the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes rates of wages, hours of labor, the salaries of officers of the corporation, of the agents of the corporation, of the attorneys for the corporation—and, of course, if it fixes the conditions of service of one class of employees it ought to fix the wages or salary of all—then, the commission must be clothed eventually with the power to fix the price of the steel which the railways buy, the ties with which they must build the roads, the coaches and locomotives in which they transact their business; and what is left?

The next step is, of course, that the Government, having undertaken to fix everything which the railway company does, must also guarantee the interest upon its bonds and dividends upon its stock. The end of it is, Senators, Government ownership and operation or the effect of such ownership and operation under the most unfavorable and most unsatisfactory conditions.

If we are compelled, in order to do justice among the people of the United States, to take away from all those who have occasion to contract or deal with the common carriers of this country their right to contract, then it is infinitely better for us at once to acquire the railroads and operate them under our own sovereignty and under our own direction. When we accomplish what I have just described, the officers of the railway companies, their general managers, and their superintendents will simply be United States officers, nothing more and nothing less. They will be officers without any sanction as to the performance of their duties and without any sense of responsibility to those who nominally and technically employ them.

I have thought of the matter deeply, and I can not give my assent to this method of fixing wages and salaries and other expenses of railway companies; for, if I must reach the conclusion that the regulation of the Government ought to extend to these things, then I am not for clothing the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power to fix all these relations; but I am for the acquisition of the railways and for their operation directly through officers of the Nation.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I intend to say what I have to say with regard to the bill itself. I think I was never more conscious of profound regret than I am at this time because of my inability to join with my brother Senators in accomplishing what they believe and what I believe to be a worthy object. I want to avert the strike. No one can overestimate the consequences of the strike. It is impossible to paint the picture in colors that are too lurid to reveal the truth; but it is utterly impossible for me, having some regard to my conscience and my oath to support the Constitution and my views respecting the outcome of legislation of this character, to give it my assent, and very briefly I intend to submit my reasons for the judgment I have formed.

The bill in its title is, of course, not only misleading but positively false. The title of the bill reads in this way:

To establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

It does not establish an eight-hour day. It has no tendency to establish an eight-hour day. Instead of having a tendency to shorten the hours of labor, its tendency is to lengthen the hours of labor.

Let us see:

That beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees.

If the view of the union men had been preserved, namely, if some penalty had been imposed by way of increased compensation for overtime, the bill, if passed, might have resulted in some shortening of the hours of labor. But the chief motive that would lead the railway companies to abbreviate the hours of labor is eliminated from the bill. Employees are paid for the hours which they labor, no matter whether 8 or 16, pro rata; and it is rather for the interest of the railway companies under this bill to work their men 16 hours every day than otherwise. It was agreed, upon the hearing before the Senate committee, that if this bill were passed the economical thing for the railroad companies to do would be to continue to work their men 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, or 16 hours, sometimes more, rather than to readjust their railway facilities so that the men could complete their runs in 8 hours.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I have read the hearings, but, of course, I was not at the hearings. As I say, I read them. It seemed to me that what the Senator has just stated was claimed by one of the presidents, but was not, from anything I saw, admitted by the representatives of the brotherhoods. It seems to me, from what little I know of railroading, that it does not necessarily follow that it would be to the interest, and in fact I am satisfied that in a great many cases it would not be to the interest, of the railroads to continue to work the men 10 hours and pay them overtime even at a pro rata rate. It would be rather to their interest to complete a run, so far as they can, in eight hours. It seemed to me the Senator was overstating it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the representatives of the brotherhoods made no statement with regard to the point which I am just discussing, but Mr. Elisha Lee and Mr. Sheean, both representing the committee of conference of general managers of the railways, stated, and no one contradicted it, that upon a survey of the whole situation the railway companies could work their men overtime more economically than they could readjust their division stations and other facilities so that they could conclude their runs within eight hours or within some approximate time.

Mr. HUGHES. As I read that statement it seemed to me that it was part of an advocate's claim rather than an admission of a fact. They were making the point that there was no disposition on the part of the brotherhoods to establish an eight-hour day, but that they were seeking to obtain 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' labor, and that by reason of what we were doing they would succeed; but I do not know of anything in the testimony on the part of the brotherhood men that would seem to admit that claim.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, Mr. President, the brotherhood men have nothing to do with it. The brotherhood men can not determine whether they are to be used overtime or not. They have no will or authority in this matter. If their employers desire that they shall run 12 or 14 hours, they must remain on their trains until their duties are concluded.

But it is not necessary that we shall be able to reduce the statement I have made to mathematical certainty, for it is just good, common, ordinary sense to know that when men receive no more for the hour between 8 and 9 than they receive for the hour between 1 and 2, there is no sufficient motive upon the part of the railway companies to reduce or shorten their hours. I am not suggesting that the brotherhood men do not desire to shorten their hours. I think they do. While they understand perfectly that an eight-hour working day is impossible in the operation of railways as they are now situated, I think they sincerely desire to shorten their hours and ultimately reach an eight-hour day. It was for that reason that in their proposal to the conference committee of general managers they insisted upon time and a half for overtime.

If some such provision as that were in the law—I do not say whether it would be just or unjust—then there would be a tendency to shorten the hours and limit them within those hours beyond which overtime lay, for the railway companies would know that they must pay time and a half for every minute beyond the aliotted time.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question only.

Mr. HUGHES. Does the Senator think it is within our power to say that for every hour over eight the railroads shall be compelled to pay one and a half times the rate for the hours up to eight?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not; at least, I doubt it very much——

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just as I doubt very much our power to say what we have said. I think we are passing far beyond our constitutional authority when we say what we have said in the bill.

I suggest to Senators also that so far as the first section of this bill is concerned, there is no value whatsoever in it to the men who labor upon these trains. What avails it to establish an eight-hour working day as a basis for compensation? Nothing. It does not shorten hours, and it does not assure fair and reasonable compensation; for if you were to assume that the men were paid but 1 cent an hour, what good would it do to pay them overtime between 8 hours and 11 or 12, as the case might be? In order to accomplish anything for the men another step must be taken, and the rate of compensation must be ascertained and fixed. Therefore, the first section of this bill is a bald, glittering generality. It accomplishes nothing. It is the brassiest gold brick that was ever tendered the people of the United States or the men who are directly interested in railway operation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted to ask the Senator what there is about the bill, in his opinion, that would induce the men to call off the strike if it were passed?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut knows these men. I suggest that he ask them. I would not venture to express their view of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I met the gentlemen at the hearing before the committee yesterday, some of them for the first time; and inasmuch as the Senator had stated quite positively that they would call off the strike if this bill were passed, I thought he might be able to tell us why.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut heard that statement just as clearly as I did. I do not ask the Senator from Connecticut to accept it on my responsibility. He was a member of the committee, and he heard it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I heard the statement of the men; but, on the Senator's diagnosis of the bill as being a brassy gold brick, I was interested to know what induced the men to accept it and call off the strike.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will presently tell the Senator what I think there is in it that gives the men something.

I will reach that in a moment, and I shall be very glad to give the Senator from Connecticut all the information I have upon that subject. It is all a process of reasoning. I do not know anything more about it than does the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I do not think I will get much information.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Connecticut evidently thinks that the passage of this law establishes an eight-hour day for these men. I do not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Neither do I.

Mr. CUMMINS. I next ask the attention of the Senate for just a moment to a consideration of what the commission is to investigate. The language of the bill is:

> That the President shall appoint a commission of three, which shall observe the operation and effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday, as above defined, and the facts and conditions affecting the relations between such common carriers and employees during a period of not less than six months nor more than nine months.

Mr. President, all that that means, all that it can mean, all that the commission can ascertain, all that it is charged with the duty of ascertaining, is how much it costs the railway companies to pay the overtime provided in this bill during the period of six months or nine months, as the case may be.

To me, the suggestion that a commission ought to be appointed to labor for six months in order to ascertain what it costs the railway companies to pay upon a basis of eight hours instead of upon a basis of ten hours is little less than ludicrous, for one good accountant in the office of each railway company could ascertain those facts and report them either to the President or to the Interstate Commerce Commission just as faithfully and as perfectly as a commission.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Iowa is a great lawyer, profoundly learned in the law and the science of government, and of long experience in this body, and of course he recognizes the gravity of the situation which confronts the American people at this time. No man in this body is more capable of grasping great questions and comprehending the scope of national issues than he. Has the Senator any suggestion to make? I grant that this proposed legislation may not be perfect. Really, nothing short of omniscience could bring forth a perfect piece of legislation as suddenly as this has been produced. I have so much confidence in the intelligence and the patriotism of the Senator from Iowa; and I should like to have him, if he can do so, give us some better plan by which we may avert this disaster.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not insensible to the compliment which has just been paid me by the Senator from Mississippi, and I am sure it is as sincere upon his part as it is delightful upon mine.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator deserves everything that I have said and more, and I am sure he will prove that by answering my question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I made a proposal to the Committee on Interstate Commerce last night; and I shall disclose no more than the mere fact that I did make a proposal, for I would not want the Senator from Mississippi or the Senate to believe that I am entirely barren in this prolific field. How many votes does the Senator from Mississippi think I got for it?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no idea.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, the Senator from Mississippi has no knowledge on that point; and it is with a very profound humiliation that I now disclose that out of the entire membership of the committee—that is, all the membership then present—not one single member approved the suggestion that I made. I may say, as I think we all ought now to be perfectly frank, that I was the only Republican member present at that time. Inasmuch as my proposal was not in harmony with the suggestion of the President, it received no encouragement from my friends in whom I have the greatest confidence, and whose general zeal for the public welfare, I readily grant, is as great as my own. Does the Senator from Mississippi think that under those circumstances I should bring forward into the Senate of the United States, to a dominant majority like this, held together in bonds not only of affection and tradition, but of fidelity and loyalty, the plan which was so receeived? No; I do not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator, then, what is the purpose of the Senator in speaking? If the Senator has a plan which would solve the difficulty, probably if the seed were sown in different soil the result might be different. He had a small committee there of a few Senators. Let us have it here in the Senate, and the able Senator might have better luck with his plan.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking with the vain hope that I may convince the Senators here that the bill which we are now considering ought not to be passed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think we can do nothing?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it ought not to be passed. I intend to vote against it, and I am trying to give my reasons for it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think we should do nothing to avert this disaster, but just remain here in a state of stupid inaction and make no effort to avert it? I should like to have the Senator's opinion about this; and I want to tell the Senator I would just as soon have an idea, principle, or policy that would solve this question from him as from the President of the United States or one of my Democratic colleagues. The idea, the policy, the measure, and not the man, is the thing that I am interested in just now.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi gives me great encouragement, and before I have finished I intend to put before him, knowing his friendly mood, at least his receptive attitude, the proposal that I laid before the Committee on Interstate Commerce last night, and I really hope that I may have one follower in this desert land.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want the Senator to understand that I do not commit myself to his policy in advance.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a very wise precaution. No man dare—I withhold that—I almost said that in these days no man dare pledge himself to follow the lines of reason and logic, but I know that is not true of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. President, I now come to the only part of this bill which is not sham and pretense, and I use those words without any offense whatsoever. There is a part of the bill that does something, and possibly if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is now listening to me he will understand why the men who are involved find themselves able to favor it. Section 3 of the bill provides:

> That pending the report of the commission herein provided for and for a period of 30 days thereafter the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday.

As I remarked, we are not adopting an eight-hour day for the safety, for the benefit, for the health, for the development of the working man. I am for an eight-hour day's work. I believe that, as the President said, it is the civilized sense of mankind that in the great majority of employments men ought not to be required to work more than eight hours.

This bill does nothing of that sort, and it has no tendency to accomplish anything of that kind, but it does say in just so many words that the trainmen—I will not pause to inquire who are trainmen—but the trainmen of the United States shall receive, until this commission reports, wages for eight hours' work which they have heretofore been receiving for 10 hours' work. This legislation simply advances for this short period the compensation or wages of certain trainmen in the country. That is all that it accomplishes. I am not sure that it will accomplish it either, because, although there are heavy penalties laid upon railway companies if they do not make the payments that are here required, I see by to-night's paper that the astute counsel of these great corporations have already decided that that part of the law, if passed, is unconstitutional, and at least some of them will not obey it, and if they do not obey it falls to the ground so far as the railway men are concerned. But I am assuming that they will obey it and will pay these trainmen for overtime above eight hours, and that their compensation will in that way be raised from 15 to 25 per cent during the period of 11 or 12 months that this situation is to exist.

I do not know whether they ought to be paid more than they are now being paid or not. I should like to know whether the members of the Senate are informed on that point. How many Senators have examined the subject sufficiently to know whether the trainmen of the United States are suffering any greater injustice on account of compensation than all other employees of the railway companies of the country? I do not know and there is not a Senator here knows. There is not a Senator here who knows how much the trainmen are now receiving. You may know of an isolated instance; but let me tell you a most remarkable thing. The Committee on Interstate Commerce sat yesterday from 9 o'clock in the morning with scarcely an interruption until half past 7 in the evening and we heard nine hours or more of uninterrupted discussion and argument and statements, and from the beginning of that hearing to the end of it no man who appeared before us, whether he represented a brotherhood, whether he represented the railways, or whether he represented the shippers, or whether he represented the public, even suggested what these men are now receiving as compensation.

The committee which reported this bill—I am not now speaking of the House, of course; I do not know how much information the committee of the House had upon this subject, but the committee which reported the bill in the Senate had no information of any kind respecting the present compensation of these men. I am quite ready to believe that it is not all that it should be. That inference, however, is simply one which I deduce from the general wage situation of the United States.

I have been in the habit of believing that there are a great many workingmen in the United States who are not receiving what they ought to get, but how can I vote to increase during a period of 11 months the wages of these men and do it by mere legislative enactment without any inquiry, without any information? How can I vote to increase their compensation during this time in the amount which this bill proposes? I for one find it utterly impossible.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask my friend, the Senator from Iowa, if the information that he says he did not obtain and he feels sure none of us is in possession of might not have been ascertained by asking a question of those men.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it could not, Mr. President, in my judgment, because that information would be scattered over records so vast that it would be impossible for anyone to have carried their contents in his mind. All that any man could have said would have been the aggregate paid to these employees. That was stated. The aggregate compensation paid to these employees was stated. The aggregate compensation paid to all other railway employees was stated. The aggregate compensation paid to the officers and office force of the railway companies was stated; but I do not know how much the engineers, the firemen, the conductors, the brakemen, and any others who are affected by this measure are receiving at this time. They are not receiving the same in Pennsylvania that they receive in Iowa. They are not receiving the same in Arizona that they receive in Maine. There is no uniformity in compensation. There is not even uniformity in standards. Whoever composed this bill I think overlooked the fact that the standards of compensation vary upon different railroads and in different parts of the country. It provides—

> That pending the report of the commission herein provided for and for a period of 30 days thereafter the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage.

There is no standard day's wage. There is a rule applicable over certain territory with certain railroads for the ascertainment of the wages of these employees, especially if they be engineers, conductors, and brakemen, who are compensated according to the distance run and the time involved in running it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. I think W. S. Carter, who is the head of one of the brotherhoods, appeared before your committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. He is the head of one of the brotherhoods.

Mr. CHILTON. Did he not give a statement of the rates of wages per hour in the different employments in the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear it if he did.

Mr. CHILTON. I notice on page 127 of the hearings before your committee a statement from him was produced before the committee giving the rates of wages per hour in the different employments.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is true.

Mr. CHILTON. I had not finished.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator must make it a question, if he will.

Mr. CHILTON. I find on that same page he compares the wages of trainmen with the wages of workmen and shows that they are about one-half the standard per hour engaged not in so hazardous employments as that of firemen and engineers. He gives that statement at page 127.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia is wrong. Mr. Carter delivered a table which had some time been written and published and was printed as one of the exhibits to his testimony, but there is nowhere in it, as I remember, information with regard to what the wages of these men are throughout all portions of the United States. There is a comparison between certain men and certain other men, but the Senator from West Virginia knows that there was no attempt to indicate how much a brakeman in West Virginia was getting. If the Senator from West Virginia knows, I should like to know how much a brakeman from Grafton to Wheeling makes in a month.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator from West Virginia does not undertake to give any information at all; he is not on the committee; but the Senator from Iowa made a pretty broad statement that there was nothing from which a judgment could be derived. This is the report of the committee of which he is a member, and it has been printed, and it is a correct statement of the wage per hour received by people engaged in different employments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not yield for an argument; I yield for a question only. I say that is not the testimony to which I referred, but it is a statement published long ago, and I have no doubt it is accurate; I have no reason to doubt it. My statement should have been qualified.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. Let me finish the statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from West Virginia desires a word.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not intend to allow the Senator from Iowa to misconstrue what I said, and I want to hasten to say to him I did not accuse him of making a misstatement. I simply said in the haste he had not read the evidence from his own committee, that was all. I know the Senator is honorable and that he would not make a misstatement, but certainly he is not sticking to the record. I do not make any criticism of him for not having read it, but still it is contained in the report, and I have read it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, until I answer the Senator from West Virginia. It was put in the record. I do not doubt its accuracy, nor is anything it contains in conflict with the statement which I made, as I understand the statement. I now yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator from Iowa will remember that there is no general complaint of the wages per day, but there is complaint by the employees as to the length of the day. They desire an 8-hour day instead of a 10-hour day. That is their principal contention in this controversy.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to state that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I can give the Senator from Iowa the wages over the country if he cares to have them, which I have received from trainmen. There is an established schedule.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I have received very many of those statements, too. I do not care to have the Senator interject those now; but I want to say to the Senator from Kansas that I agree with him. I have no patience with this criticism of the men of the union that all they desire is an increase of wages. I know it is not true. I know that they desire that their hours shall be shortened, and I would like to do something to shorten their hours instead of doing something to lengthen them.

Mr. THOMPSON. They desire eight hours for a day's pay, and then pay for overtime if they are required to work overtime.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no effective way of shortening the hours unless the railroads are penalized for working them overtime.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. REED. If the railroads were required to pay time and a half for all overtime, that would be, in the opinion of the Senator, a penalty?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be a penalty, but I am not prepared to say that is a proper penalty.

Mr. REED. Very well; it would be a penalty. If they are required to pay two-thirds of this amount for working overtime, is not that two-thirds the same penalty?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it is not a penalty at all.

Mr. REED. If a man has worked anywhere from 8 to 16 hours and gets $5 for the entire time, and we change the scale of wage so that if he works 8 hours he gets his $5, and if you make him work 16 hours he gets the rate of pay for each additional hour that he would receive for the 8 hours, so that he would get for the 16 hours something like $15 instead of getting $5, as he does under the present system, how can the Senator say that is not a penalty upon the roads—that it does not increase the pay that much?

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly the Senator from Missouri and myself do not use the word "penalty" in the same sense. The employee will get more money——

Mr. REED. The roads will have to pay that much more.

Mr. CUMMINS. If paid for overtime on an 8-hour basis, then he would get more than if paid for overtime on a 10-hour basis.

Mr. REED. Yes; of course he will, and the roads complain that it will cost them many millions of dollars.

Is it not true that that many millions of dollars is in the nature of a financial penalty visited upon the roads for working the men overtime, and to that extent an inducement for the roads to try and complete the day's work within the eight hours?

Mr. CUMMINS. I coupled up the statement I made with the remarks some time ago that the railway companies said, and they produced their figures, as they always do, to prove their conclusions, that instead of trying to shorten the hours in which the men should work, it would be more economical for them to pay the overtime than it would for them to change their facilities so that they could make their runs within the time.

Mr. REED. Has some railroad president said that?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. REED. Or has some manager said that? Does the Senator believe that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe it is partially true.

Mr. REED. Partially true, but also partially untrue.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know to what extent it is true or untrue. I can well understand, and the Senator from Missouri can understand, that it will be a very considerable expense to the railway companies to shorten their runs so that they can all be made in eight hours. If the basis be 12½ miles per hour, the run then must be not more than a hundred miles in length, and the division stations must be changed; their passing facilities must be reconstructed. I accept, with some reliance, the view of the statisticians that they would pay the overtime rather than reconstruct the business and their facilities.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me one more question—he has been very kind about yielding—is it not true that, according to the standards fixed, a hundred-mile run is now regarded as a day's work, and that the great majority of the runs are arranged on the hundred-mile basis?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not in the sense in which the Senator from Missouri means it. A hundred miles at 10 miles an hour is now the basis for compensation for overtime; but the actual run is more than a hundred miles, even though made at a speed of 10 miles an hour.

Mr. REED. It is more than a hundred miles in some instances, but not in all instances.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think in the western country the average run is over 120 miles; there is no uniformity about that. In my own State, for instance, the average run is nearly 150 miles for most of the freight trains; but the basis of compensation at this time has nothing whatever to do with the actual distance run. The railroads take a hundred miles and 10 hours as a basis, and for the man to earn his day's pay the run must be 10 hours or less or a hundred miles or less. He gets pay accordingly. What the men want is a basis of twelve and a half miles per hour and eight hours or less.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me another question, is not the Senator of the opinion that the public has a right to insist, in these days of rapid transportation, that freight shall be moved at least twelve and a half miles an hour, which is about three times as fast as an ordinary able-bodied man can walk?

Mr. CUMMINS. I rather think so; but I am not qualified to judge of that. The Senator from Missouri must recollect this is not running time. The time begins when the man is called from his bed in the morning, or at least when he reports.

The time occupied in starting, the time occupied on the sidings, the time occupied in all the delays that are incident to railway operation is included.

Mr. REED. I understand; but the fact remains that the railroads of this country have been very much in the habit of moving freight very slowly, and that the public has suffered thereby. If they had a little stimulus to move those trains along at least at the rate of twelve and a half miles an hour, would not that be a good thing for the shipping public?

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri, although I am not prepared to say that trains under all circumstances could be moved at the average rate of 12½ miles an hour. Anything that will increase the speed, within the bounds of safety, ought to be encouraged. But, now, mark: I agree that these men will get an advantage for the next 11 months; they will get more pay than they are now getting. The railroads estimate that they will get $61,000,000 more pay in a year under this bill, while the men themselves estimate that they will get from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 more pay in a year than they are now getting. Now, I should like to see everybody rich and everybody get all the money that he wants; but I am not prepared to vote to increase the pay of these men without investigation or information for either 11 months or for any other period. I had much rather leave these men with their natural powers of bargaining, their collective power of dealing with the railway companies. They have advanced from comparative slavery to their present high estate——

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I hope he will not interrupt me again just at this moment.

They have advanced from a state of comparative servitude to their present high condition because they have organized themselves and have dealt like men with their employers and upon equal terms. I, for one, do not want by my vote to take away from them, or to begin the course that will take away from them, that only weapon which will at the same time make free men of them and give them adequate compensation.

Now, let us see what will happen at the end of 12 months. At the end of that time the commission will have reported. As I said a few moments ago, while its powers are rather vague, I do not believe that it can do much more than report the expense to the railway companies of this increase that we grant in the bill.

What then? The very moment they report, the force of the law which I am now considering is at an end; the railway companies are no longer obliged to pay them according to the present standard of compensation. Let us assume that the recommendation of the commission will be against the eight-hour working day as a basis for computing compensation with the present standard of wages; let us suppose the commission is against it; and it may be very fairly assumed that it will be if we are to believe—and I have great sympathy with it—a statement made yesterday, that it is very hard, it is very difficult, indeed, to secure an impartial commission to determine what shall be paid by a railway company to its employees. You must take the commission either from those who are interested in the employees or on that side of the controversy, or upon the other side of the controversy; and it has been the experience of the past that usually the deciding voice of any such commission was from that element in society which had little sympathy with the advance in the rate of wages.

Suppose that the decision is against the increased wages, what then? What will the men do? Will they surrender what they have been receiving for a year or a half year, and continue to work under the old conditions, under the old wages, or will they strike? What do you think they will do? The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said this afternoon that in the meantime we might prepare some legislation. What legislation? I challenge any Senator here to instance the kind of legislation which is to take care of that emergency. Is it legislation which is to deprive the union men of the country from quitting work in a body? Who on the other side of the Chamber suggests that sort of legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, inasmuch as he has offered a challenge?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to say that, so far as I am individually concerned, I have sent to the desk proposed legislation which, in my opinion, meets the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know what anybody else would do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know; that is precisely it. I was coming to that. I assume that you do not propose at this time that after the commission which we are now to appoint has decided that the increased wages ought to be paid no longer, or, at least, are not justified, you are not intending—and I hope some Senator will correct me if I am wrong—to pass a law which shall forbid the union men from striking. If you are not, then what is the remedy to be applied at the end of the six months? The Senator from Alabama has a remedy, and he is the only man here who has had the courage and the independence to propose any such remedy. He takes the railroads entirely out of the hands of the owners and of the operators and gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to fix the hours of labor and the compensation for labor. I have said all that I care to say with regard to that amendment to this proposed law or to any law. I am unalterably opposed to it. I think that it will destroy every valuable thing which we have created in the last quarter of a century respecting the government of these instrumentalities, so that, as the Senator from Alabama has said, if you dismiss his amendment, at the end of 11 months you will have just the same situation that you have now. You will have men who have enjoyed for a little period increased wages, and then chaos. Do you think that the railway companies will continue to pay the increased wages? They will not do it now, and why should they do it then? They have resisted the demand now to the point of an utter annihilation of commerce. Have you any reason to believe that they will do it at the end of six months? No. With the best of feeling in the world I say to those who have proposed this measure that you are keeping the promise to the ear and you are breaking it to the hope; you are striking not only at the integrity of organized labor but you are destroying the independence of industry; and if we can not find any other solution of the difficult problem we had better far suffer the catastrophe which seemed so imminent a few days ago.

I do not intend to forget my promise to the Senator from Mississippi. If I could write just at this time the measure which ought to be passed, it would be directed wholly to the present emergency; it would be entirely a temporary measure. I would create a commission authorized to examine this subject, to examine the exact dispute between the union of railway men and the railway companies; and I would suspend during the examination the privilege of striking in concert. You now have the solution that I would propose for this difficulty. In connection with that it ought to be said that I am not in favor, however, as a permanent law, of taking away from union labor the right to strike in concert, unless there is substituted for that right under these grave contingencies and impending catastrophes a tribunal in whose justice I would have profound confidence.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am about to yield the floor. It is not the work of a moment or the work of a week to pass legislation of that character.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. It seems to me that this proposed measure is only temporary. Now, if it serves to bridge the chasm, the Congress will meet again in December before any harm could possibly result from its enactment, and whatever defects there may be found to exist in this measure Congress could then supply them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so——

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator will remember that on yesterday I suggested that an effort be made on the part of Congress to induce the brotherhoods or the leaders to postpone the strike in order that time might be given for the consideration of this great question. I am opposed to this sort of hasty legislation, just as the Senator is, but I think that if this measure is passed it will be acceptable to the employees of the railroads, and no harm can possibly result to the railroads. It will, as I have said, bridge the chasm, and possibly enable Congress to deal intelligently with this question, and save the country the disaster that would follow a strike at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course the only difference between the Senator from Mississippi and myself is that he asks for the delay, and I would take it; but I am moved by the suggestion just made to another suggestion. He says no harm comes from this. Is that true? If these men are justly entitled to the compensation which is given to them, then those who pay the freight rates ought willingly and cheerfully to advance the freight rates, if that be necessary, in order to bear the increased burden which is put upon the railways; but I am not so convinced of the justice of advancing for this period the compensation of these men in contradistinction to the compensation of any other men, knowing that the President of the United States intends that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall add this additional expense to the freight rates of the country. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] was quite right when he said that the President had courage. He had the courage to state to the Congress of the United States with perfect frankness that he desired a bill passed which would refer the report of the commission which is proposed to be created to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that that commission should accept the findings of increased expense, if the findings were of that character, and that, then, if other revenues of the railway companies were not sufficient to absorb the additional wages, the rates of freight should be increased. I am afraid, Mr. President and Senators, that in the transfer of the expense incidental to legislation of this kind from the railways to the public they will not only be increased as they actually exist, but if the expenses are increased $20,000,000 the rates may be increased $40,000,000. That is the history of all such transfers as the one I have just described. It always happens that in passing the burden along there is an immense weight added to it; and I believe, Mr. President, that it is due to the great body of the people, who ultimately must pay the cost, that there should be more careful investigation and more accurate knowledge before we, by legislation, advance for a period the compensation of any given class of employees.

Mr. SHAFROTH obtained the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to see whether we can not reach an understanding regarding a time to vote to-morrow. I would suggest that we proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending and upon the bill itself at 3 o'clock to-morrow; that a recess be taken to-night until 10 o'clock to-morrow, and that beginning at 12 o'clock the length of speeches be confined to 20 or 30 minutes upon the bill and 5 minutes upon any amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator reduced his request to writing?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please send it to the desk and let the Secretary read it.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, September 2, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees, and so forth, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, the vote upon the final passage of the bill to be taken not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the said day; and further that after the hour of 12 o'clock noon on said day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes upon the bill nor more than once nor longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that he make the time shorter than 30 minutes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Make it 15 minutes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. What would the Senator suggest?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest 15 minutes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will adopt that suggestion.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest making the limit 10 minutes after 12 o'clock. That is time enough.

Mr. LANE. Let it begin right now, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will assent to that, if it is agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. While I do not speak in my own interest, because I probably shall not occupy 2 minutes, if I occupy 1, yet I think 15 minutes is a better period. I think it would satisfy more Senators.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Make it 15 minutes. That will do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well, then. I will modify the request to that extent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request in its modified form?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, 15 minutes each would enable only 12 Senators to speak. There are a good many Senators here who would like to speak only 5 or 10 minutes. Do I understand that we begin voting at 6 o'clock?

Mr. NEWLANDS. We will commence voting at 3 o'clock.

Mr. KENYON. The arguments, however, are to cease at 3 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. Except on amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that if he begins this limitation of debate at 12 o'clock it does seem to me he ought to extend the time until 4 o'clock and make the limit 15 minutes in order to give everyone an opportunity to speak on the bill, if he so desires.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does that meet the approval of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is a very desirable suggestion to extend the time to 4 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am rather curious to know why Senators care to speak 10 or 15 minutes. What is the object of speaking? Is it merely to get a personal expression of opinion in the RECORD, or to influence the action of the Senate?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not the latter.

Mr. STONE. Then, if it is the former, if it be possible, I should like some sort of leave to print and put it in the RECORD, so that we can get to a vote. It is absolutely nothing but a waste of time—we all know that—for Senators to get up here and consume 10 and 12 minutes in a speech that goes into the RECORD explaining why they are for or against this thing or the other. The best way of expressing their opinion is by a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that a request for unanimous consent is not debatable.

Mr. STONE. I am aware of that; but the Chair had permitted it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had not. The Senator is mistaken about that. The Chair permitted suggestions about modifications of it.

Mr. STONE. I am through, however.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In what form does the Senator submit his request for unanimous consent? How does he modify it—by inserting 10 minutes instead of 30, or 15 minutes?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Fifteen minutes after 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the request? I ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is that we commence voting at 4 o'clock instead of 3. Is it agreeable to the Senator that debate shall end at 4 o'clock—that there shall be no further debate after that time?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I understood that there would be five minutes' debate upon amendments after 4 o'clock or after 3 o'clock, whatever time is fixed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the request may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Mississippi that as soon as the Senator from Nevada determines the text of the request it will be stated to the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am trying to reach an understanding, and there are different views, of course, and I want to satisfy everybody. It is proposed, therefore, that we shall take a recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We will have to dispose of this matter before we can dispose of that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That from 12 o'clock on the speeches shall be limited to 15 minutes upon the bill and 5 minutes upon the amendments, and that no Senator shall speak more than once, either upon the bill or upon the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At what hour will that limitation become effective?

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that at 4 o'clock we shall proceed to vote, without debate except upon amendments, and that debate upon amendments be limited to five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on Saturday, September 2, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees, and so forth, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, the vote upon the final passage of the bill to be taken not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the said day, and further that after the hour of 12 o'clock noon on said day no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 15 minutes upon the bill nor more than once nor longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that he put in the word "calendar" just prior to the word "day," for fear of some misconstruction as to the meaning of the word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made. Is there objection to the request in its present form?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as the Secretary read the proposition there was no reference to 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; there was.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to hear that part of the proposed agreement read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement again.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, September 2, 1916, the Senate will proceed to vote, and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if I understand that request, under it a Senator might get the floor at 10 o'clock and hold it until 12, using two hours of the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Thereafter no Senator would have an opportunity to speak more than once upon the bill, and then not longer than for 15 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If that is the form of the request, I object to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator suggest a modification of it that will be satisfactory to him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; to put it in operation right now, instead of at 12 o'clock.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was addressing myself to the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Wisconsin will suggest some modification that would please him, that will dispose of the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to call attention to the same thing the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested, and I was going to ask the Senator from Nevada if he would have any objection to making the 15-minute rule apply at the opening of the session to-morrow.

Mr. NEWLANDS. None whatever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, it will be fair to everybody.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would that be satisfactory to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I perhaps might be the one most likely to transgress and consume the two hours' time if I succeeded in getting the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification now proposed by the Senator makes the limitation operative at 10 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest that the first two hours be split up into 30-minute speeches.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I shall make no objection to fixing a time for a vote; but I wish to say for myself that Congress is creating a precedent that will return to plague it unto the utmost generation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are now considering a request for unanimous consent, and the Chair has called the attention of some Senators to the fact that it is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not intervene to delay the consideration of this bill under the restrictions named, nor to take a roll call in accordance with the order to be entered, as I understand, by unanimous consent; but never in the history of Congress or of this country has a matter of this importance, creating a legislative precedent that will turn Congress into an arbitration board for all time, been disposed of with so little consideration for the interests of the entire country. Congress is put in a craven attitude—an attitude of being incompetent to represent the American people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels compelled to call the Senator's attention to the fact that a request for unanimous consent is not debatable.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator does not object, as I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD what I have said. With that I am content. The rest of the time I will get in under the five-minute rule. If I can not say enough in 5 minutes, it will not be my fault, and in 15 minutes I can improve on it considerably.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does not the roll have to be called before the agreement is made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unquestionably, whenever we agree on the text of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I think any Senator is capable of saying all that we want to hear in 10 minutes. I suggest that the limitation be 10 minutes, and I shall object to a longer time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been objected to. Fifteen minutes has been objected to.

Mr. LANE. I withdraw my objection, then.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Secretary state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement so that it can be clearly understood.

Mr. GALLINGER and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not recognize any Senator until he can do so understandingly. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that we have reached an agreement in regard to the matter?

Mr. GALLINGER. I would suggest to the Senator from Nevada that under the rule the roll must be called.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. During the calling of the roll I think the Senator from Nevada can adjust the differences, and unanimous consent will then be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing can be done during the roll call. Let us agree on the text before it is submitted to the Senate on a roll call. If there is objection, it is useless to call the roll.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request in its present form? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hughes	Owen	Smoot
Brady	Husting	Page	Sterling

Cummins	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Vardaman
Curtis	Lewis	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Dillingham	McCumber	Sherman	Walsh
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Shields	Warren
Fletcher	Myers	Simmons	Williams

Mr. POMERENE. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence on account of illness of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is unavoidably absent on important business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The unanimous-consent agreement will stand, a quorum being disclosed.

RECESS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, September 2, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 1, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, and our Father, whose providence has ever been round about us to strengthen, inspire and guide us as a people, continue, we beseech Thee, to assert Thyself in all our future. Help us as individuals to crucify the selfishness within us and the evils that follow in its wake, that we many learn the art of doing unto others as we would be done by, that the desires of Thy heart may be fulfilled in us and peace, joy, and happiness be ours. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask that House bill 15158 with Senate amendments be taken from the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the bill H. R. 15158 with Senate amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15158) to amend the Judicial Code; to fix the time when the annual term of the Supreme Court shall commence; and further to define the jurisdiction of that court.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] moves to concur in the Senate amendments. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION STATION AT BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 6034, Union Calendar No. 333, appertaining to the immigration station at Baltimore.

The SPEAKER. What is the status of it?

Mr. LINTHICUM. It is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is it just a House bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; it is just a House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6034, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6034) to make available a portion of the appropriation for the immigration station at Baltimore, Md., for such counters, booths, screens, railings, seats, bunks, kitchen and laundry equipment, etc., as necessary in connection with said station.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this bill to take any considerable time?

Mr. LINTHICUM. No; it will not.

Mr. MANN. I want a few minutes upon it.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman ought not to take up time with it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will hear me——

Mr. GARRETT. I have no objection to the bill. The only inquiry I made was whether it would take time.

The SPEAKER. How long will this bill take?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not think it will take five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be wiser to have the bill go over until later in the day.

The SPEAKER. The only ground on which the Chair let the gentleman in was that it would not take up much time.

Mr. MANN. Any time used on it now is time lost irremediably. The gentleman can follow it up later in the day.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest to the gentleman to let it go over.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I withdraw it for the time being.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will give me his attention, I want to see if we can take up the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, by unanimous consent and make an agreement as to time.

Mr. MANN. I think any time used in discussing it now would be so much time wasted.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has no objection to taking it up now?

Mr. MANN. I do not think we can make any agreement about taking it up.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill may be in order now.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman making a request?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; asking unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 17700.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 17700, the eight-hour bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 363 (H. Rept. 1183).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 17700; that there shall be not exceeding two hours of general debate, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and one-half by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]; that all debate shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill; and that the bill shall be in order for all legislative days except Calendar Wednesdays. At the expiration of general debate, amendments may be offered, considered, and disposed of until 4 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on Friday, September 1, 1916, when all pending amendments shall be voted on without further debate, and the committee shall then rise and report to the House the bill and all amendments that shall have been recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motions, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] if we can agree upon time for discussion of the rule?

Mr. LENROOT. What has the gentleman to suggest?

Mr. HARRISON. Well, would 20 minutes on a side be sufficient?

Mr. LENROOT. I have a number of requests for time on this side. I think we could agree upon 30 minutes, after which the previous question could be moved. I think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman move the previous question? I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that in the discussion of the rule there shall be one hour's debate, 30 minutes of which time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and 30 minutes by myself, at the expiration of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that debate on the rule be limited to one hour, he to control one half and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] the other half, and that at the end of that hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to reserve the right to object?

Mr. LENROOT. I do. I will say to the gentleman that if he moves the previous question I will not try to prevent a roll call, but I object to unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. I move the previous question on the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] for 20 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, a grave problem now confronts the American people. It is due to the conflicting claims of the railroad employees and the railroad managers. The questions involved in the dispute were so important to each of the contending parties that an amicable settlement could not be agreed upon; and when these issues became so sharp that a settlement between the parties appeared to be impossible, in the interest of the American people the President offered his generous offices to aid in an adjustment of those differences. For over two weeks the President has exerted every influence, has demonstrated almost superhuman patience, to bring the parties to an understanding and avert a strike. He has given his time, his labor, and his thought to the controversy. I need not discuss the distress, the inconvenience, the cost, and the effect on the business of this country if this strike should come. You know it, the President knows it, and the American people know it. It was not until the President had exhausted every means at his command to bring these contending forces together to avoid the strike, and had failed, that he appealed to the American Congress to enact such legislation as would prevent the anticipated strike.

To-day we are not confronted with the question of whether we sympathize with the employees or sympathize with the railroads. We need not become partisans to either side of that controversy. This question sinks into insignificance, and we must look above and beyond it to the interests of the American people.

This strike must be averted! The responsibility is on our shoulders. We must respond to it! If we pass this rule and the bill, the consideration of which it calls for, which is, after all, legislation to meet an impending emergency, I believe that this strike will be averted and the interests of the American people safeguarded and protected. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I agree with Mr. Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor, in one statement that he made yesterday. He said there were worse things than strikes. There are, and one of those things is the destruction of the American system of government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I shall vote against this bill. I was born in a railroad town (Port Jervis) and know railroad men. I suppose I am one of the few men in this House who have when a boy coupled freight cars with their bare hands, in those old inhuman days when even the use of the brake stick was prohibited by the railroad rules.

I was put into public life by union labor men—plasterers and bricklayers—and for 11 years on one street corner in New York City, on the Saturday night before election, whether I was in office or out of office, I went and stood on a truck in a labor neighborhood, having first issued a general invitation to that neighborhood that any man could come and ask me any question as to politics or anything else.

I have not always agreed with laboring men, but I have never deceived them, and because I have never deceived them, although they have disagreed with me at times, they have for nearly 20 years been my most loyal supporters. I shall not deceive them now, for this proposed legislation is the worst blow that anyone ever dealt to organized labor. [Applause.] Did you see the cartoon in the Washington Evening Star last night? It is a picture of a stalwart man in the costume which usage has made familiar to us as the costume of the railroad man, holding a watch on Congress and saying that we must pass legislation before a certain time, whether that legislation is right or wrong. That is shotgun procedure.

Mr. HILL. Did not the gentleman on the other side admit that?

Mr. BENNET. I did not hear it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BENNET. To neither.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, that cartoon is true; and from that cartoon to the roll of the tumbril and the click of the knitting needles of some Madame Defarge is a space that is almost measurable. I for one do not propose, at this or any other stage of my legislative career—I have never done it in the past, and I do not propose in the present or the future—to cast my vote with a pistol against my head. [Applause.]

Day before yesterday a mob in Lima, Ohio, took the sheriff of that county from his home with a noose around his neck in the effort to force him to deliver one of his prisoners over to them, and I stand here to laud that brave man because they could not get him to violate his oath of office until they had beaten him into practical unconsciousness, and, because he resisted long enough, the dignity of the law was upheld. I purpose for one to keep myself in a position where I can at least have the right to look that man in the face. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I have regretfully declined to yield to others.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman would like to hear what I intended to say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BENNET. I am against this bill, in the second place, because it is revolutionary. Oh, to-day you are trying to fix the pay of 400,000 men employed in one industry, to give them an increase of 25 per cent. If you fix the pay of those 400,000 men to-day, you must fix the pay to-morrow of the remainder of the 2,000,000 men in that industry. If you fix the pay of the 2,000,000 men to-morrow, within a short time you will have to fix the pay of every employee of every factory in the United States that manufactures goods to go into interstate commerce.

By this act to-day we take the first step away from the old democracy of Thomas Jefferson and the Federal policy of Alexander Hamilton to the socialism of Karl Marx.

I am also opposed to this bill because it is unconstitutional. Why, in Two hundred and thirty-sixth United States, in the case of Coppage against Kansas, almost this precise question has been passed upon within the last two years; and when this House attempts to say to the railroad men of the country that it is giving them 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' work—let us use the plain, old Anglo-Saxon—it lies to them. [Applause.] I prefer to tell the truth now to them rather than explain to them later when they find out the truth.

But gentlemen say they are going to vote for this bill because it will avert a strike. This bill will avert no strike. I do not know that it will even postpone it. We have no statement from any responsible source that the passage of this bill by this House to-day will postpone this strike for a minute.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. BENNET. I have declined to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has repeatedly declined to yield.

Mr. BENNET. In the short time I have I must decline to yield to anybody. When we say to these 400,000 men to-day by the passage of this bill that we are giving them wages which we are not giving them, and when some days or weeks or months from now they find our perfidious attitude exposed, then the strike will come; and then we will be without remedy, because the people of the United States will then be treating, not with 400,000 fellow citizens who have no special animus against the remainder of the country, but with 400,000 of our best and sturdiest citizens who have been deceived by the highest legislative body of the country. We are averting nothing, and possibly we are not postponing anything, but I will tell you what we are doing. We are cutting the ground out from beneath our system of legislative government in this country. And we are doing another thing. We are concentrating power in the Congress of the United States and loading ourselves with responsibilities which under no possible circumstances can we discharge. We have been in session now for nine months. We have passed a good deal of legislation, but we are criticized every day by organizations all over the country because we have not passed more legislation. Physically we could probably not have passed more.

We have been in session more days and hours than any other legislative body in the world ever sat in the same length of time. And the nearly 16,000 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the largest ever printed, is proof of the enormous labors of Congress. When we attempt to take up the question of regulating the rate of wages of every employee not only on the railroads but in every factory that makes a yard of cotton cloth, in every grocery store that sells pure food whose sale we regulate under this same clause of the Constitution, when we reach that advanced stage of governmental socialism, then the legislative power of the Government, from sheer weight of labor, will have disappeared as an effective power from the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL].

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the prompt enactment of this bill. I understand that it is intended as a temporary measure, but it is an absolute necessity, as the commerce of the country is about to be paralyzed. I think that every intelligent man, woman, and child in the land recognizes to-day the great loss that will be sustained by this country, and every individual in the country, if the strike which has been called goes into effect on next Monday.

This is an emergency measure made necessary by the conditions confronting us, and the effect of it will be temporary. The permanent rate between the parties to this controversy is finally to be determined, and in a few months, by a commission that will be appointed by the President of the United States. I think we can all with perfect confidence trust him to appoint men who will be just to both sides of this question.

My sympathies have always been with the men who toil—I presume because of the environments that have surrounded me all the days of my life—and my sympathies always will be with those who labor and produce the wealth of the country; at the same time I recognize that the railroads and all other employers of labor are entitled to their rights, and I do not want to do any injustice to them. I believe that this proposed legislation will stop the threatened strike, and I shall use my voice and cast my vote for this bill, believing it is probably the only means within our power that will prevent that awful and impending calamity to the American people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] who has just spoken says that he does not believe this law if enacted will stop the strike. I understand the labor unions, or their representatives, say that if this legislation is enacted that it will stop the strike. The President believes that it will stop the strike, and the committee that has charge of this bill believe that it will stop the strike. It is worth while at least of an effort on the part of the American Congress to try to provide a remedy that is at this time a matter of supreme importance to all the people of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the only objection I have to this rule is that it does not give time enough to discuss this important question. It does not give one who thoroughly understands the question time to refute the charges that have been made that the railroad men are standing here holding up Congress for legislation.

I know the history of this contest in regard to the efforts on the part of the railroad employees to secure an eight-hour day. They have been earnestly striving for it for years. This matter has been under consideration for the past year. They have referred it to the membership, with a vote of 94 per cent in favor of an eight-hour day or a strike.

Now, they did not ask the administration or Congress to get into this matter. You have not had this brought before you at the request of or by the efforts of the representatives of the brotherhoods or these men who are representing the brotherhoods.

The men who are representing the brotherhoods have been criticized without justification because they will not agree to postpone or declare this strike off; they are acting under directions, so to speak, from their organizations, and their hands are tied. I say it is erroneous for anyone to say that the railroad men or the workingmen of the country have stood with a gun in their hands holding up the administration or Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I have not the time, I have only three minutes. The railroad brotherhoods are not in full harmony with the legislation that is embodied in this bill, but they have agreed as a compromise that if such legislation is passed that it will avoid this strike. They are not in full harmony with the commission part of it, which means that we are going to consider and investigate in regard to the application of the eight-hour rule to the railroads which will give the railroad jugglers of the country an opportunity to make it appear that it will cost much more by overloading the trains, and so forth. That they may come to the Congress or the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask and receive, if the same powers now in office who are in sympathy with giving the corporations of the country who have inflated stock for the purpose of deceiving the people of the country, additional rates of freight so that they can further rob and plunder the people of the country.

These are the things that the men have acquiesced in, not because they are in harmony with them altogether, because they know the railroads are not entitled to any increase of freight rates on account of the application of an eight-hour day. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall object to all requests to extend. Let the RECORD show what actually takes place.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks information from the Interstate Commerce Commission showing the income of the railroads, which shows that 155 large railroads received $278,000,000 more this year than they did last year.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the insertion of a document.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Extract from report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for year ending June 30, 1916, for 155 of the largest roads.

Net revenue for 1916	$1,019,631,711
Net revenue for 1915	741,369,887
Increase in net revenue in the last year	278,261,824

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, there will only be one more speech on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise to say a word in defense of the railroad men who belong to railroad organizations in this country.

The gent'eman from New York [Mr. BENNET] left the impression that the railroad organizations were trying to hold up this Congress at the point of a gun. The railroad organizations did not bring the question to Congress. They were having a negotiation with the employers in New York City, and when these negotiations were broken off the President of the United States asked the railroad organizations to come to Washington. The President used his best influence to try and settle the controversy between the employers and the employees, and when he could not settle it the President of the United States came to Congress and appealed to this body to pass this legislation. The railroad men have not asked Congress to pass this piece of legislation that we are considering to-day.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did they ask the President to interfere?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have not time to yield—but they did say that if this House would pass this bill to-day and the Senate would pass it to-morrow, so that it would become a law, they would have the power to call this strike off. Mr. Speaker, I know of no body of workingmen in the United States to-day who are a better, more law-abiding class of citizens, honest, and industrious, than the railroad men of this country. [Applause.] They have been conservative in asking for better conditions, and I do not believe that the railroad men of the country have had a strike since 1894, and I rise at this time in defense of the railroad organizations and say again that it was not the railroad men who brought this question to Congress, and they should not be accused here on the floor of this House of coming to Congress and trying to hold us up at the point of a gun. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I for one am glad that the responsible Democratic Party of these United States has accepted the responsibility for this wise legislation. Since I can remember, the issue between the people of the United States has been whether the Democracy really recognized the interests of the workingman, and to-day we have a demonstration here on the floor of this House as to whether a Republican stands by his organized-labor friends or whether the Republicans will stand by them and the people of these United States and coerce those people who are trying to keep in their own pockets the great prosperity that the Democracy has brought to our Nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the proof is they do not. I believe that the man who works with his hands is entitled to a fair return for his toil, and when the country is prosperous he is entitled to an increase in his wage. I believe that eight hours are long enough for any man to work at a skilled trade. When the clock goes round in its circle it should be divided into three periods, as was provided by the King of France in ancient times. It is for that principle that the workingman of America has been fighting, and I am proud that the Democracy of the United States has taken this great step toward the establishment of that principle, which is recognized in the mind of every free-thinking American as just and proper. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily for this bill to provide an eight-hour day for men in the train service on interstate railroads, and I want to say that I would be glad to support it if there were no strike impending. It is not a piece of temporary legislation, but is, as the President of the United States has pointed out, a very much needed addition to our code of laws, brought on, of course, by the exigencies of the occasion, but not confined to the particular crisis in which we are now involved. I believe that the people of the United States generally recognize the great social principle of an eight-hour day for labor. I think that Congress in responding to that demand is voicing the appeal of the laboring people, the producers, and the great masses of the United States of America. I do not believe that the expense of putting in force an eight-hour day will equal what the railroads have claimed. I was in the railroad business myself years ago, but that was before the day when legislation, enacted by Congress, had guaranteed to the railroads a fixed income upon their property. To-day the railroads are the only class of business in the United States that is absolutely guaranteed a profit upon its business. The men who work for them are not guaranteed a living wage, the men who ship over them are not guaranteed a profit, the farmer who raises the produce which constitutes the commerce of the railroads is not guaranteed a profit, but the one business institution in the United States that is guaranteed a fixed return upon its investment is the railroad itself. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the matter now pending before the House is not the exact merits of the bill that is to be considered. The question is whether or not the Democratic Members of this House, having a majority, after knowing the impending strike and the conditions and the merits of such legislation, after having had presented to them the reasons by the President of the United States why such legislation should be enacted into law—whether or not we should delay days, weeks, months in this legislation, or whether or not we, having the power, with the majority of the votes, to take up the question, consider it thoroughly, give it enough consideration, and then vote upon it and determine and say to the people of this country that we can not only make promises but that we can make them effective by our votes and enact those promises into law. That is the question that is now before the House, and this resolution should be adopted so that the main bill pending—H. R. 17700—may be taken up by this Congress immediately and to-day passed by the House by a good strong vote that will bring about results. I shall vote for the rule and then for the bill. I am in favor of the legislation proposed with the amendment to be offered by the committee excepting from the provisions of the bill electric street railroads and electric interurban lines and short-line railroads. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the emergency which exists, which calls for speedy action upon this bill, but there was no reason why this entire day, at least, should not have been devoted to a consideration of it. Nothing will be gained in the way of expediting the bill through the other House of Congress by compelling a vote at 4.30 o'clock instead of 6.30 o'clock or still later. The minority members of the Committee on Rules offered the very reasonable amendment that the debate be extended for two hours. That was rejected by the Democratic majority, and we are compelled to face this tremendous question with practically no debate and practically no consideration.

I expect to vote for this bill [applause on the Democratic side], but I shall not vote for it as a measure of justice to the railroad men employed, for I do not know whether it is just or not, and there are not a dozen Members of this House who have any judgment based upon facts as to whether it is just or not. There has been no consideration of the merits of this proposition in the committee or elsewhere by the Members of Congress. The demands of the brotherhoods may be absolutely reasonable; they may be unreasonable. I do not know, and you do not know; and yet I shall vote for the bill, because with the emergency which exists we have the choice of voting blindly to-day, surrendering our right to have facts to form a judgment upon the merits of the proposition, or having a strike that in its effect and results will be equal to war in the suffering that will follow.

Who is responsible for this condition the future will tell, but, in my judgment, one who must share the responsibility for this awful condition is the President of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, during the 16 or 18 years I have been in politics I have, as a rule, stood with the labor organizations. I have had the indorsement of the Federation of Labor in my campaigns in the past. I hope to merit their indorsement in the future, whether I shall have it or not, but as to this controversy, to my mind there is only one thing involved and that is whether the railroad employees of this country are entitled to greater compensation or not. That we do not know and can not judge, because we have not the facts to form a judgment upon. If it was an eight-hour law, if it meant the railway employees throughout the United States would quit work at the end of 8 hours and have 16 hours of rest for sleep and recreation, I could stand for it upon its merits. No one believes for a moment that it is an eight-hour law, but that it is a means of increasing the compensation of the railway employees of this country, which, perhaps, ought to be increased. I do not know, but that is the issue. That was the great controversy between the railway managers and their employees, and the President of the United States, without investigation of the facts, decided the major portion of the controversy in the interest of the railway employees; and after he did that, I want to say that the heads of those brotherhoods are not so greatly to blame for the position they have now taken. Why? Because if the President had not taken that position, knowing these railway employees as I do, knowing, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

COOPER] has said, there is no more patriotic lot of men in the United States than that class of employees.

Mr. GORDON rose.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield. I am satisfied if it had not been for the position of the President of the United States we would not have been confronted with the condition we have to-day, and the railway employees and the railway managers would have gotten together upon some kind of arbitration, but the President himself now has prevented it. Mr. Speaker, the President in his message to this Congress, delivered a few days ago, said that this matter had been pending for more than a year. I want to ask you gentlemen on that side if this situation has been pending for more than a year why have not you attempted to secure legislation that would prevent this awful condition that now confronts us? You say now that it is only a temporary measure of relief, that in the future legislation will come that will prevent this sort of thing. Why have not you been doing something during the past year; you seem to have known about it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield. During all the years I have been in public life I have fought, as best I coul.., to establish the principle that railway managers have an obligation to the public and that the public have an interest in the conduct of the railroads. I never believed that it would be necessary for the Congress of the United States to consider the proposition of whether or not the men who work upon the railroads do not likewise have an obligation to the public [applause on the Republican side], and whether or not legislation is necessary to regulate to some degree their conduct as well as the conduct of the managers themselves. Mr. Speaker, so far as compelling a man to work upon a railroad against his will, this Congress nor any Congress will never stand for that and I will never vote for it; but so far as concerted action is concerned for the purpose of enforcing a demand prior to an investigation by some impartial tribunal, what has come about in this emergency impresses me that the time has come when the sovereign authority of the United States will be compelled to enact such legislation as will prevent that sort of action prior to some careful impartial investigation. Railway employees must recognize that they have an obligation to the public and they can not by their demands upon the railroads ignore the fact that 2,000,000 babies, in the event of a strike, may suffer and many die for want of milk. They can not ignore the fact that we have 10,000,000 children in the United States to-day that will suffer grievously through a railroad strike. They must recognize some obligation to the public. On the other hand, in the future the public must recognize the rights of the railway men and see to it that they secure fair treatment at the hands of the railroads.

So, Mr. Speaker, as I say, while I shall vote for this bill to-day, I want it distinctly understood that I vote for it to avert this strike and not because I have any opinion as to whether the merits of the bill are correct or not. Mr. Speaker, I have 1,800 railway employees in my city. I have 2,500 in my district. I have a primary coming on next Tuesday. The easy way for me to do would be simply to vote for this bill to-day and say nothing. I do not know how what I have said will affect my political fortunes, Mr. Speaker, but when I go out of the Halls of this Congress for the last time I may take nothing else with me, but I do propose to take with me my self-respect. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it is utterly immaterial to us and the world on what ground the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] bases his conduct if his conduct is right, and as he is going to vote for the bill I congratulate him and will not criticize the reason for his action. I am sorry the gentleman saw proper to attribute to the President the blame for this situation. I only wish to say, whether the great President of the United States should be blamed or credited, his record of accomplishment is good enough for him to stand it, anyhow. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will not say with the apostle that I am neither for Paul nor Apollos. I will say that I am against neither party in this case. I am for both of them. They occupy the position of two parties who are conducting an affray in the streets to the terror of the king's subjects. I represent the people. All of these carrier officials and employees are our servants. If they do not realize it, they will have to come to the realization that they are as much servants of the public as you and I. A condition presents itself and not a theory. There may be ten thousand different opinions as to what ought to be done to adjust relations between our two classes of servants when we have time and opportunity to give deliberate consideration to those questions.

This is inaptly described as temporary legislation. It is hasty legislation, I admit, to meet an emergency. There is but one substantial thing in it, and that is the eight-hour law. We have been committed to the hours-of-service law for years and years. We have a 16-hour law and a 9-hour law, and gentlemen who can read the provision of the Constitution declaring that Congress can regulate commerce between States and then cavil about the constitutionality of Congress doing anything to regulate commerce reads the Constitution with different kind of glasses to mine. We now put in the eight-hour law and provide to preserve the status quo until a commission can investigate the dispute between these two classes of our servants. Afterwards we will make complete and adequate regulation, taking care of the interests of both classes of our servants and doing justice to the people, to whom all service belongs. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The question was taken, and the rule was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17700, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, under the rule will this reading of the bill suffice or will it be necessary to ask to dispense with the first reading?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. It is a very short bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning December 1, 1916, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad which is subject to the provisions of the act of February 1, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in any capacity in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads, from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the President shall appoint a commission of three, which shall observe the operation and effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday as above defined and the facts and conditions affecting the relations between such common carriers and employees during a period of not less than 6 months nor more than 9 months, in the discretion of the commission, and within 30 days thereafter such commission shall report its findings to the President and Congress; that each member of the commission created under the provisions of this act shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the President. That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the necessary and proper expenses incurred in connection with the work of such commission, including salaries, per diem, traveling expenses of members and employees, and rent, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books, salaries, and other necessary expenses, the same to be approved by the chairman of said commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That pending the report of the commission herein provided for and for a period of 30 days thereafter the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday.

SEC. 4. That any person violating any provision of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 and not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not to exceed one year, or both.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to offer a substitute for this bill. When, under the rule, is it proper to do so?

Mr. ADAMSON. When the motion to recommit is made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the rule provides that amendments may be offered to the bill and they may be separately voted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. At the expiration of the general debate amendments may be offered. No amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to offer a substitute at this time and have it pending.

Mr. ADAMSON. That can only be done after we reach the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to offer a substitute at this time and have it pending. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I do not think we ought to do that until we get to the five-minute rule. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is entitled to one hour and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to one hour.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, was there any objection made to my request?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to object.

Mr. MANN. I objected.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, unless my colleagues see proper to ask me questions later on, I hope to consume very little of that hour, preferring to allot it to other gentlemen who desire to speak. We all realize the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves. I think it is unjust for gentlemen to charge that anybody is being prodded or driven about in connection with this matter. The question of an eight-hour day is not a new one. Every Member of Congress has general information enough to have been familiar with the discussion of that question for years. It has come up suddenly at an unfortunate time for those who were wanting to adjourn Congress and for the commercial population of the country, because it is at a season when the crops are ready to be moved and business, it was hoped, would be bountiful and prosperous. It makes it the more serious and necessary that if possible we should do something to relieve the situation.

The gentlemen operating trains made demands six or eight months ago. Several of us in the House have been observing their conferences and discussing matters all the time that they have been negotiating with the carrier officials. The carriers declined the demands of the operatives of the trains. The operatives were threatening to order a strike. It was the duty of any patriotic American citizen to intervene and make suggestions to solve the difficulty and prevent a strike if possible. The President of the United States, to whom we all look with respect and confidence, invited the two parties to confer with him in the hope that as a mediator himself and in conjunction with the Board of Mediation he might bring about an accommodation of the differences. He failed. The brotherhoods ordered a strike. The President stated the case to Congress. There was nothing new in anything he stated. Everything had been discussed before for years. He did systematize and place before Congress some suggestions. In framing this bill the members of the committees of the two Houses which have jurisdiction of the subject have canvassed the situation. We found that in the conferences, before the President laid the matter before Congress, one party, the party threatening the strike, had agreed to certain propositions which he had made to them. The other side had rejected those propositions, demanding that full and absolute legislation covering the whole field should be had now. We can not wait for them. There is not time now. All we could do was to be consistent with the proceedings had with the President and the two parties to the controversy.

One party, threatening to strike, had agreed to certain propositions. We considered logically that if Congress enacted into law those propositions, it would be unjustifiable for the brotherhoods to strike. Logically they could not strike, because we are doing just what the President proposed to them and just what they agreed to accept. We have no contract with them. We have not talked to any of them lately. We are following reason in the matter, and we believe that the adoption of this eight-hour law, with the safeguards which we have provided to protect the status quo until investigation can be made, ought to be had now; and we believe that if it can be done and that if it will effect the result desired, it is our duty to do it, and in all the future, in all the subsequent sessions of Congress, we will all have ample opportunity to present our views, discuss the questions at length, and try to adjust all the relations between these two classes of our servants, with justice to both. We are compelled to preserve the railroads.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman be willing to state whether he regards this as a temporary measure or not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I stated on the floor that it was inaccurately named "a temporary measure." It is somewhat hasty; it is to meet an emergency; and we are doing no more now than is necessary to meet an emergency, in our judgment. The eight-hour law is nothing new in this country, on the idea of safety for people and property on trains. The people who operate the trains, it is contended, ought to be in the full possession of all their faculties of mind and body, and if they work only eight hours a day except in cases of emergencies, which is the practice, then they would be in the full possession of their faculties; and on that theory we have legislated for hours of service. We have 16 hours and we have 9 hours, and if a train may be in the middle of a wilderness when 16 hours arrive, there are only certain conditions which forbid their being taken off the train and the train stopped. We have heretofore touched the subject. We are only going a little further with it, and saying it is safer to make it eight hours. But we are not going any further than that.

That is the only substantive provision in the bill. We think that is all that it is necessary to do now, with the addition of a provision to preserve the status until an investigation can be had of its workings—until full and free investigation can be had.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Are we to understand from the statement of the chairman of the committee that the committee is doing this just because it is considered necessary now?

Mr. ADAMSON. It seems to me it is considered necessary to do that now, and I think the committee agrees with me, and I think the people of the country agree with me.

Mr. DENISON. Another question, if the gentleman pleases: As I understand it, it limits its application to those employees of the railroads who are absolutely engaged in the operation of the trains. Is that right?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; that is the theory upon which we have based all our legislation on hours of service.

Mr. DENISON. Now, if the chairman, in speaking, urges this legislation on the basis of the demand for an eight-hour law, why is the bill limited to a particular class of people?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not what I contend at all. The people demand that we avert this threatened strike by legislation. I will now turn Yankee and answer the gentleman's question by asking him one: With this strike staring us in the face and threatening business and a rise of prices next Monday, if he does not do this, what would he do?

Mr. DENISON. I think we ought to be honest and plain, and if we are enacting this legislation because we believe in the enactment of an eight-hour law, I believe it ought to apply to all employees engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will be as honest as I am, he will vote for this bill, because I believe that in the case of people operating trains the eight-hour law is right for public safety [applause], and it being right, and civilization recognizing it as right, and as that naturally will probably avert a strike, I think it is honest for people to vote for it and avert a strike.

Mr. DENISON. Another question: If civilization recognizes this eight-hour law as right, is the gentleman now in favor of applying it to other railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am in favor of applying it, as I stated nine times, to the people who operate the trains; and unless the gentleman sees proper to answer my question, I decline to yield further to him.

Mr. DENISON. Now, the gentleman——

Mr. ADAMSON. I decline to yield further, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERLEY). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time have I used, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman reciprocate by answering my question, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] refused to do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will try to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have received so many applications for time that I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have used 10 minutes; and unless what I say is not understood, I shall ask my friends not to interrupt, because I am trying to save time for others.

In a dispute about wages, when a strike is threatened, and with it the great public calamity of the stoppage of business all over the country, it is the duty of the Government to use every means to mediate between the parties or to furnish to them some impartial court, whether of arbitration or not, to settle that dispute. But when this course is refused it is dangerous, if it be not beyond the power of the Government to fix wages in the way that was demanded by the party that refused the arbitration. And it is certainly most impolitic for any government to go ahead and do so without at the same time providing means to prevent the recurrence of such a calamity and dispute.

The controversy in this case is almost as far-reaching as war. Railroad men form an army of whom we are proud, an army of millions. The cream of that army, about one-fifth of the whole, are the trainmen who manage the movements of railroad trains, those tremendous engines of communication that roar from town to town. These men daily take their lives and our lives in their hands and are faithful to their trust. Their organizations have kept substantial peace for 40 years, obtaining what was needed for their members by negotiation and not by war. The last arbitration of the engineers and firemen with the eastern roads was in 1913, and with the western roads in 1915. Now the horror comes upon us that this splendid organziation of splendid men refuse to arbitrate, and demand that the pay which was given them for 10 hours' work shall now be given them for 8 hours' work, so as to increase their pay by a quarter. They refuse to arbitrate. They say they will strike, and in order to avoid a strike it is proposed by this bill to give them this increase of wages for the next year.

I say they refuse all arbitration or any settlement except compliance with their demands. The railroad men are about 2,000,000 in number. The trainmen are about a fifth of them. While negotiations were pending, and in order to prevent a stoppage of all national life, and while the President was urging that some settlement be made, it was learned—I think last Monday—that they had actually set Monday next for the strike—only a week away. The President brought the matter to Congress, and he made seven different recommendations, not only of the provisions of the bill but also including provisions that we should authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to recommend increases in freight rates when made necessary by wage increases; that we should also provide by law that a full public investigation of the merits of all disputes such as these should be instituted and completed under our mediation statutes before any strike or lockout might lawfully be attempted; that in case of military necessity the President might take the roads and draft men to operate them; and that arbitral awards should be judgments of records in courts of law and enforced by those courts. All these recommendations are ignored by this bill. It is a bill that simply grants an increase of wage, without any remedy. I disagree with the chairman of the committee. The time to see that a remedy is given is now and not hereafter. You will never get a chance again.

The trainmen are the best paid of the railroad employees. It was stated in the Senate hearing that the eight-hour day would mean $61,000,000 a year of extra expenses to the railroads for the trainmen alone. This bill covers many others beside trainmen. It covers all men in any capacity having to do with the operation of trains. That means switchmen, flagmen, yardmen, telegraph men. There are a host of them, and what the difference of expense to the railroads may be we do not know. Now, section 1 of the bill provides that from January 1 next eight hours shall be the measure or standard of a day's work and deemed to be a day's work. It used to be 10 hours. By section 2 the President appoints a commission of three men to observe the operation and effect of this change. The time is important. They are to sit not less than six months nor more than nine months from January 1, 1917. They are to take 30 days for their report, and until 30 days after the report no reduction can be made by the railroads in the payment of 10 hours' pay for an 8-hour day. That means 11 months from January 1 next, or 15 months from now. This is not a temporary measure. By section 3, pending the commission's report and for 30 days thereafter, the pay for 8 hours shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, with a pro rata for extra time. This bill not only fixes 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' work, but forbids all reduction in such pay for 11 months from January 1, or 15 months from this date.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the coal strike both sides were told by President Roosevelt that they must arbitrate, and that they should not be suffered to injure the public by stopping the mines, even if it became necessary for the Government to step in and operate those mines. That principle of compulsory arbitration would be still more applicable to public roads doing the whole transportation business of the whole country. But this bill, instead of enforcing arbitration, gives to the side that will not arbitrate all that they ask, except as to overtime, fixes this from 12 to 15 months without relief, and provides no means to prevent a strike in the future or to fix wages or freight rates. The Government should neither favor nor disfavor any person or body of men. Its sole object and action should be to protect the public. It might well prohibit a stoppage of the veins and arteries of our national life. It might well order that all these men should hold their places as public servants, free from any right of their employers to discharge them, and free from any right on their part to go out as a body and upset public business. It might provide a commission or court of mediation or arbitration to fix and settle all disputes. But Congress should not fix wages without full investigation, and no one should be able to force Congress to act in that regard without the opportunity to have such investigation made, and what is done, done fairly. [Applause.] I submit that now is the accepted time to perfect any such bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side who have been opposing this measure speak as if the situation now existing was one for which the employees of the railroad companies were wholly responsible. That is a mistake. The railroads have had fair notice for more than a year and have been negotiating with the employees for the settlement of this question, and have declined to accept any reasonable terms, and the responsibility for the situation to-day is as much or more with the railroad companies than it is with the employees of these companies. It appears from the light we have on the controversy that the companies have sought the critical situation and have done much to bring on the crisis, or at least they have not tried to avert it. The President placed before them, as the country knows, a fair proposition, in order to avert the threatened disaster which necessarily must result if a strike occurs, and they peremptorily turned it down and refused his good offices. The employees accepted his proposition and were ready to abide by what he offered. It is therefore clear the railroad managers are responsible for the situation which now confronts the country, and the people know it.

Now, what is the situation. These men are asking for eight hours' time as a day's work. Society recognizes that eight hours constitutes a day's work, and it is for the good of the employer himself that eight hours should be substituted instead of longer hours. He wants the best service he can get for the pay, and the men want to give the best service possible. They know exhausted, tired men can not give that, and hence it is necessary that the eight-hour day service be instituted. Experience, the best teacher of all teachers, has demonstrated that the eight-hour day in this service is the best for the public, the employer, and the employees, and should be adopted. Safety requires it, economy demands it, and humanity expects it, and employers in this line of service should grant it. Many economic reasons unanswerable support it, and to withhold it is a manifest injustice. These men that handle the trains perform an indispensable service to the country, and it is essential that while on duty they should be at their best, in order that their service may meet the public requirements. If they are not at their best, the service will not come up to the standard of public demands, and hence the transportation business, important as it is, will suffer. No one wants that, and all should unite to avoid it. This proposition, therefore, vitally affects us all. I stand for the eight-hour day in this department of the service, because it will promote efficiency and expedite the business, and, further, because it is right.

These men are performing enormous services and earning large returns for their employers. Their labors have been increased out of all proportion to the increase in their wages. Thirty years ago it took the same number of men to man a train that it does to-day, but the train did not consist of over 20 or 25 cars, and yet to-day the average train runs from 60 to 100 cars and sometimes more. The largest capacity of any car in those days was 28,000 pounds, and to-day it is 150,000 pounds. The same number, five men, the engineer, the firemen, the conductor, and two brakemen composing the train crew are doing to-day in the railroad business what it took more than 25 men to do 30 years ago. And yet their pay has not been increased in proportion with their labors. The capacity of the car, the tonnage, the number of cars in the train make a condition that one man to-day is doing as much as five men did 30 years ago.

Does anyone contend that in order to secure efficiency, do justice to these men, that long hours of labor should be imposed? Should not our regard for the welfare of our fellow man protest against such an imposition? They face danger, encounter hazards to life and limb in the discharge of their duties, and render a service in which the whole people are deeply interested. Then we should see to it that proper regulations are thrown around their service to protect them. The public expect it and humanity requires it. We should not hesitate in doing what the public welfare requires, and I hope we will not. But it has been contended that this will impose a burden on the public which will require an increase of all transportation rates. I deny it and submit the facts which refute all such contention.

It seems these railroad managers cared nothing for the public. They did not recognize the public had any rights in the matter. It appears from what has taken place in the attempt to adjust the controversy the railroad companies treated the whole matter as a private concern of their own, disregarding the public welfare or the serious consequences to the country. In this regard they defied public opinion and stood ready to let the public suffer and bear the losses which would inevitably follow if a strike should occur. The blame for this situation is therefore upon them and not upon the employees, as some would have us believe. The people understand this and fix the responsibility where it properly belongs. The course President Wilson has pursued in this great crisis commends him as a courageous public servant, ready and willing to meet every responsibility necessary to serve the people.

What is the situation of the railroad company? Their earnings were never as much as they are to-day. They were never making as much money as they are to-day. Let us look at their revenues as shown by the Interstate Commerce Commission, as reported for the years ending June 30, 1915 and 1916, for 155 railroads. For the year ending June 30, 1915, their net receipts, after deducting all expenses, were $741,369,887, and for the year ending June 30, 1916, they were $1,019,632,711, a net gain of $278,262,824. This is only for 155 railroads; others would increase this. Does this look like they would need an increase of rates to bear the additional expense, if any, on account of the adoption of the eight-hour day? Surely not. But this year the business is more profitable than ever before, and their earnings will break all previous records; and yet they are so parsimonious that they are unwilling to share any of their prosperity with their employees. Think of it. How can anyone believe it; and yet it is true.

It does not speak well for their generosity. These men are important factors in earning their great revenues, and they ought to be willing to share the profits as other industries are doing all over the country. It is an established policy now and one that has proven most profitable to the operators wherever tried.

The adoption of the eight-hour day will not entail additional expense. The schedules of moving freight trains now on all the leading roads is 12½ miles an hour; a day's work is 100 miles; and hence by their own schedules they have adopted practically the eight-hour day. Now, if the management will move their trains on schedule time they will perform the day's work in eight hours as laid out by them, and give the public a better service, and there will be no overtime and no additional expense, and if any such is incurred it will be practically negligible. This measure, therefore, secures efficiency and better service. The clamor about an enormous additional expense has no substantial basis and has only been injected into the controversy for the purpose of scaring the people and arousing public opinion against the just claims of these employees. That has been its only purpose, and the sponsors of it should be exposed and condemned, as they surely will be when the facts are made known. It is a subterfuge trumped up for the purpose of defeating the merits of this great controversy. It will not succeed, because it is not true.

The situation with the roads is this—they are overcapitalized, and it has brought about the condition which embarrasses them and imperils their existence. Their high financing is bringing them to grief and well it should. If we were to take the money that is actually invested in the railroads and fix freight rates upon the real investment and wages upon it, and estimate the earnings, their income would be enormous. One great system in this country last year made a net earning on its actual investment of cash of 266 per cent, and the records show it. But their overcapitalization absorbed their income and deprived real investors of their profits. That is the situation. And yet the earnings have been diverted because of overcapitalization so that it does not reach the proper channel for the development of railroad business in this country.

Now, if this legislation was not enacted, what would be the situation? It is not a question as to how it is brought about, but before next Saturday night every factory, mine, and business would suffer, would be compelled to close down, employees would be turned out of work, and business would be at a standstill, paralyzed, all because the railroads have elected to reject a fair proposition and thereby punish the innocent and the helpless.

It is time Congress exercise its functions and regulate this matter and have the great disaster averted. The passage of this measure will restore conditions and compel them to do what they are refusing to do.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERLEY). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, there is no use for gentlemen to talk about this being an eight-hour law. There is no provision in this bill to create an eight-hour day for railroad men. This bill will not shorten the workday of a single man a single minute. They will work just as long after this becomes a law as they do now. It is the simple question as to whether Congress shall increase the wages of these men 25 per cent. They can work now to the extent of 16 hours per day. When this bill is passed they can still work 16 hours per day.

The man that works 10 hours now and gets $10 per day gets $1 per hour. When this becomes a law the man will get $10 for eight hours' services, or $1.25 per hour. He will get $1.25 for every hour he works over eight hours. So that the man that works 10 hours now for $10 will get $12.50 for 10 hours' work under this law. The man that works 10 hours for $5, or 50 cents per hour, will receive 62½ cents per hour when this becomes a law. There is no limitation at all as to the number of hours that he shall work, except the limitation that is already in the law, of 16 hours per day as the maximum day.

Now, that is the question, as to whether the Congress of the United States in order to avert a strike will undertake to increase the wages of the trainmen of this country 25 per cent without knowing whether or not it is just or unjust. I realize that it is an emergency measure. We may console ourselves now by saying that it is a temporary measure, but the same influences that prompt us to pass this bill to-day will prevent Congress from ever changing it. The same powerful organization—and I have nothing to say against the splendid manhood of the men that run the trains in this country—but that same powerful organization will be here at the doors of Congress forbidding that the change shall be made if, after the investigation provided for, it is found that the increase is unjust.

It is useless for gentlemen to rail against the railroads. It is of very little importance to them whether or not this bill becomes a law. They say that, in their opinion, it is an unjust demand on the part of the men. I do not know whether it is unjust or not, and I undertake to say that I know almost as much about it as other men on the floor of the House. None of us know whether it is a just demand or an unjust demand. The railroads say it is unjust. The men themselves claim that they are entitled to this increase of wages. The railroads of the country will not pay the increase. The people that we represent, our constituents throughout the length and breadth of this land, will pay this increase. It will add to the cost of transportation the sum of $60,000,000 per year. It is a question now whether or not without investigation, whether or not without knowing the merits of the demand of the men or the claims of the railroads, we are willing to put upon the people of the country the burden of $60,000,000. I submit to you that it ought to be investigated that we may determine where justice lies. I propose to offer an amendment to the bill which, if it will not meet the present emergency, it will safeguard the future. I want to submit to the Members on this side and on that side that the President of the United States in his message to Congress urged that there be a provision for arbitration, for investigation, to safeguard the future.

It is eminently a fair demand upon the part of the President, and why should we not add to this bill a provision that in the future when controversies of this kind arise there shall be a full and fair investigation. Add it to the bill as it is. Pass this bill, if you will, upon the ground that it is an emergency and for the purpose of avoiding a strike, but put in this bill a provision by way of amending the present law providing for a Board of Mediation and Conciliation requiring an investigation before a lockout or a strike.

It may be that some gentlemen here are not familiar with the law of mediation and conciliation as it is now. It provides for a board to be appointed by the President, to whom both sides or either side to a dispute may apply, or the board itself may proffer its services to reach an amicable adjustment of the differences. If they fail in that, it is the duty of the board of mediation to bring about arbitration, if it can, and the law provides the machinery for an arbitration. But there is nothing in the law now that will prevent a strike or a lockout while the proceedings are going on.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there? Do you believe in compulsory arbitration?

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe in compulsory arbitration, and I have not suggested anything that even hints at compulsory arbitration. The law as it is now gives the men the right to agree to arbitrate or to refuse to arbitrate, and if they do arbitrate it provides a plan by which they may arbitrate; but this amendment which I shall offer will be a supplement to the mediation law as it is now, providing that in case the parties refuse to arbitrate, or if either party refuses to arbitrate, the board of mediation may order an investigation, to be made by a board to be made up of men to be recommended by the two sides and appointed by the President. It makes unlawful a strike or a lockout until the investigation is completed. The investigation will cover all points at issue and Congress and the country will know who is right and who is wrong.

Why not be fair to both sides, and especially let us be fair with ourselves. We ought not permit ourselves to be forced into this important and far-reaching step until we know what is the right thing to do. I almost fear a panic has seized upon Congress and that it may take a step that it may want to retrace when it is too late. We are not prepared to pass on these questions until the investigation is had. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT].

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, with all my heart I favor an eight-hour workday. This is no change overnight; nor is it born of the stress of the pending industrial dispute. It is the burning conviction of a lifetime. A nation-wide railroad strike, awful as it would be, could give but few new reasons for an eight-hour day. It could only emphasize the old ones. The principle is old, basic, and fundamental. It involves the well-being of the great, toiling, wealth-producing masses, the bulk of the human race. It is not merely a question of higher wages—of more dollars. That is highly important, but only incidental to the larger issue. The overshadowing question is whether a day's work shall be so long as to leave the toiler's body wasted, his patience worn, his spirit vexed, and thus render him unfit for the high office of father or husband or citizen. Our bodies and our souls have their limitations. We are not men of steel. We have not God's patience and forbearance. Under modern strain we go to pieces easily; we snap like a thread; we break like fragile pottery. We must lessen this strain. An eight-hour day for work—all work—will be a tremendous stride in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, my limited time does not permit elaborate discussion. But my whole heart is in this measure. It should be passed, and passed now. It will avert the strike. That will be an achievement of incalculable value. But in preventing an impending catastrophe we shall at the same time do a great and lasting good. We shall, with a single stroke, meet an emergency and establish a great economic principle. The railway trainmen should have an eight-hour day. All questions of wages can be properly adjusted under the provisions of this bill. But our action will go infinitely further. It will be the beginning of an eight-hour day generally, that goal for which the toiling masses and those who toil with them in spirit have so long striven. God knows I would not do the railroads any injustice. I have always been their sincere friend. I should be ashamed to wrong those great agencies of good, those mighty pioneers of civilization, simply because they are big and well to do. It would be utterly unworthy of me or any other man. No harm will come to them under this bill. Rates should be and will be so adjusted as to do them full justice. They will be gainers, not losers, by this change. Only contented, well-paid employees can be truly efficient. It will not deepen the breach between capital and labor; it will heal it. It will not aggravate their differences; it will compose them.

I trust there will not be a single vote against this bill. We ought to pass it unanimously. Let the voice of party be hushed. Let the roaring campaign be still. For this great task our consciences ought to be quickened, and our vision should be clear as the bright sun of this day. And let us not be unmindful of the far-reaching effects of what we are about to do. If we pass this bill, surely our deed will live after us. Our children will rise up and call us blessed. An eight-hour day for railway trainmen means an eight-hour day for all American labor. An eight-hour day for American labor means the beginning of an eight-hour day for labor throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, I am impatient for the previous question and an opportunity to vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. BRITT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman for one minute more.

Mr. ADAMSON. I regret that I have not got it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, this bill has one merit over the message of the President. It is frank and explicit. It does not pretend that it affects merely the hours of labor, but states that its purpose is to give the same pay for 8 hours as is now given for 10; that is, it increases the pay 25 per cent. The message ostensibly was concerned merely about the question of hours, and might mislead one to think that the vital question was hours of labor and not the amount of wages. Neither the railroad employers nor employees pretend that an 8-hour working day is practicable on railroads, and the President was well aware of it. Some men now work less than 8 hours, some more than 10. The emergencies of railroad service obviously make it impossible to regulate hours as in stationary employments. The arrangement of hours and pay are complicated and must differ on different stretches of road. What is really aimed at now is a 25 per cent increase of wages, and, however the President might endeavor to becloud it, that has been the well-understood issue between the parties from the first.

When that is the issue, my sympathies are always instinctively with the employed, so long as they do not resort to violence, because I believe that generally wage earners do not get their fair share of the products of their toil; and though I recognize that an increase of wages must generally be paid by the public and adds to the cost of living, yet I am ready to stand my share.

I do not mind the high cost of living so long as the extra cost goes into the pockets of those who need it most. In this case I hope the men's demands are fair and that they will obtain them. But I do not know whether they are fair or not, and not one member of the committee which reports this bill knows. But under threats from men who refuse to arbitrate you are going to enact legislation of whose merits you are ignorant. Certainly neither the representatives of the employers nor employees can give us a disinterested or impartial judgment. You are passing this bill, not because it is right, but because you are threatened. That is not only humiliating but is sure to breed future threats. Arbitration is the only fair method we know of to determine what is just. This differs from most strikes in two ways: First, if persisted in, it would vitally affect the business, the comfort, and the health of the whole Nation. That of itself should exact the greatest forbearance. Second, the employers are forbidden by law to increase their prices to compensate for increased expenses. They say they can not afford to raise wages unless they are allowed to raise rates. Whether that is true, I do not know, nor do you. It can only be determined by adjudication. I can conceive of no case where both because of its importance to the public and its intrinsic complexity, a determination by an impartial tribunal is so necessary, and yet this committee, without a single hearing, takes sides and determines the result for one year. Of course, the blame for this rests primarily on the President. It seems to me that when the case was first brought to him he failed signally to measure up to his duty. He had a disagreeable and dangerous task. It was shortly before election. There were 400,000 voters on one side and only 400 on the other. He might well have wished to be spared a decision, as we might here to-day. But he was the chosen representative of the people. Great honors imply great responsibilities. They ought to be met with courage. If in the name of the public, which was so deeply concerned, and with the weight of his great office, he had demanded arbitration, I do not believe it could have been denied. One hour of Grover Cleveland or Theodore Roosevelt would have settled it. We needed a President of courage and resolution, who would listen to the voice of justice rather than of expediency, whose eye would look to permanent results and not to the coming election. Now, this House blindly and obediently follows the President's will. You allow yourselves to be held up by momentary fear and make no provision for future exigencies, but simply grant what is demanded at the moment by those who refuse to arbitrate. Such action is the surest invitation to future holdups. I believe this is preeminently a case for arbitration and I am not willing, under threats, to sanction a settlement whose justice this House is not allowed time to investigate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I am more than gratified to know and hear at this late day that the honored Representative from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] finds some good in that great Democrat, Grover Cleveland. I doubt, however, very much whether the gentlemen whom he has named can be coupled in the same class—to wit, ex-President Grover Cleveland—with ex-President Theodore Roosevelt. When the gentleman from Massachusetts undertakes to say that the President of the United States has failed in his duty, and failed to suggest, or even attempt, that arbitration should be had, I think that he is not speaking by the book. The President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, did suggest, and almost demanded, from both of these parties that they should arbitrate. But as Grover Cleveland said in his day, this is not a theory that confronts us, but it is a condition, and while every man of this House, of honest opinion, except he who is a strict partisan, is willing to admit that there may be some doubt about the ultimate wisdom of this legislation, and while as a lawyer I am willing to admit that it is in part an experiment, we as honest men here must recognize that the country is sick at this time and it needs an heroic remedy, and the only remedy that now appears in sight is this legislation. I want to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], or the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], if you please, what remedy would they propose other than this. I have been assured by the labor representatives, or at least by one of the gentlemen of this House who is in touch with them, that if this legislation is passed to-day and affirmed by the Senate of the United States it will operate to prevent a strike. And while I, as a conservative Democrat, believe in the old principles of constitutional democracy, doubting the expediency and wisdom of this legislation, I believe that the result which would be obtained by not passing this legislation would be more disastrous to the country at large than by passing it, and therefore I am willing to vote for the proposition and take my chances in that way.

One question has been raised here that I desire in my feeble way to answer and possibly to refute. It has been said by my honored colleague upon the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee [Mr. STERLING] that this is an attempt, and not only an attempt but a direct method, of raising wages. I grant it. No man who is honest will be able to say that this bill does not only in contemplation but in fact regulate the wages of the employees of the common carriers. But now, my friends, let us see for a moment whether Congress does not have the right inherently to regulate wages of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce.

The general proposition is this, and I do not assert it merely as a lawyer, but reasoning from basic principles, that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to regulate rates. No man will contradict that. It has been done, and affirmed. If it has the right to regulate rates, then it must take into consideration everything that goes into the making up of those rates, and one of the great essentials in making up the rates is the expense in the overhead charge. That expense consists largely of the wages of the men who work upon the railroads. If, then, it has the right to fix rates and must take into consideration the wages paid to the operatives, which go into the expense of making up the charges upon the road, I say as a matter of clear reasoning, as a matter of actual sequence, the Congress of the United States has a right to determine the wages that shall be paid. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I allot five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this legislation at this time. If we were to have an opportunity to go into the merits of this case, if we were to have an opportunity to exercise something like the same judicial and magisterial duty toward the parties to the controversy that we enjoin upon and demand from the courts that this Congress creates, then it might not be unlikely that the testimony and the evidence so submitted would convince me that there was some truth and justice on the side of the men who demand the eight-hour day. We should keep in mind, however, throughout all this discussion, as has been several times intimated here, that this is not a demand for an eight-hour day which shall limit the hours of physical labor to eight hours in a day. It is a demand for an eight-hour basic pay day, consequently placing it on altogether another footing. However that may be, it seems to me that the only thing which presents itself here to us to-day as men intrusted with the responsibility of government, and men upon whose shoulders for the time being—however unworthy individually we may be—the self-respect and majesty of this Government of ours rests, is this: When any man or set of men, whether they be friends, schoolmates, fellows, companions, trusted confidants, or kinsmen, hold up the Congress of the United States and say that they shall have certain legislation passed between this hour and Saturday night or they will bring national calamity, bloodshed, suffering, starvation, misery, and want upon this land, it is time for somebody to stand up in the United States and say that the Government of the United States is greater than any combination of men under it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not yield. That is the principle now, it seems to me, that confronts us here in this issue, and it rises preeminently, unspeakably, above the mere details of the merits of this controversy. Instinctively, and by reason of my early surroundings, from my education and environment, I am in sympathy with men who are toiling for a wage. I could tell you something about it if it were not of a peculiarly personal character and had no real bearing on this issue. I could persuade and convice you that I am speaking sincerely when I say that. But I say to-day, as we stand here facing this proposition, that the merits of this dispute are no longer involved until the Congress of the United States asserts its dignity and majesty and self-respect and refuses to be held up by anybody at any time under any threat or under duress. [Applause.] Once begun, where is this surrendering to end? Men may say under these circumstances it is necessary to have this emergency legislation, because by doing this thing under pressure and under duress in the very few hours that remain to us we will avert the horrors of bloodshed and a strike. Who will be responsible for that strike? Who will be responsible for the bloodshed and the horrors, and want and suffering and privation that may follow because of it? Will we? Are we men to be held responsible for those who set out to bring about a national calamity on the land because we do not yield to them and grant their demands under the terror of a threat? Where will the moral responsibility rest when the people of the United States wake up and find out who did this thing? It was not much more than 50 years ago when men said in this very Chamber if we did not yield to a historic demand there would be horror and bloodshed and civil war. "For God's sake let the erring sisters go and avert bloodshed and war," they said. But there were men in those days who stood up like the men they were——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to reiterate that the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen have not asked or demanded this legislation. They are agreeing to accept it as a compromise, and, if I understand the situation properly, the railroad men of the country do not care much whether you pass the legislation or not.

Now, there is much said here in regard to the great public. We are always appealing to the sympathy of the public. I want you to know that the public, when it comes to the question of considering an eight-hour day, always votes in favor of it. In the State of Colorado, I believe in 1901, they voted there about three to one for an eight-hour day. Some years ago they took a vote in the State of New York, and they voted there by an overwhelming majority for an eight-hour day, and that carried with it the authority to the State to fix the wages. So do not permit yourselves to be deceived about the dear public in regard to this matter, because they are in harmony with the eight-hour day.

Now, there have been many—probably unintentional—misleading statements here with regard to what the trainmen are asking. It is said that they demand overtime for every hour that they work over eight hours, which is misleading, because on a division 125 miles long, under their proposition, overtime would not accrue until the crew had been on duty 10 hours. In other words, 100 miles and eight hours are synonymous. They measure the day by eight hours or 100 miles. On a division 150 miles in length the crew must be on duty 12 hours before overtime accrues. So that a railroad that operates a division 150 miles in length is not penalized on account of the eight-hour day any more than a railroad that operates a division 100 miles in length. The principle is simply this: That the freight train, from the time it leaves the terminal until it arrives at the opposite terminal, must make an average speed of 12½ miles an hour.

In regard to investigation, we have all the information that any man could want in regard to this matter. We have just received the Industrial Commission's report, that made a thorough investigation of the industrial conditions of the country, which favors the eight-hour day. We have the report from the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shows that the railroads' net receipts are enormously increased and that they can afford to pay this eight-hour day. We have over 20 per cent of the mileage of the railroads now operating under the eight-hour day, and it is no longer a system that has to be tried or is to be put on its merits. The roads now operating under the eight-hour day have not lost anything in the way of an increased expense in operation. It is practically proven now that the eight-hour day can be applied with very little, if any, additional expense.

What the brotherhoods ask is that the 12½ miles per hour be met. They do not want overtime. They want them to stop overloading trains so that they can not run over 12½ miles an hour. Their demand is reasonable. In my judgment, if this Government, both administrative and legislative, had kept their hands out of it they would have had granted to them the eight-hour day. [Applause.]

I want to say that those who are in control of the railroads of the country are the stock jugglers. I want to exclude from that, however, the presidents and the managers of the railroads. They are men who have come up from the ranks, and, as a rule, they are able and liberal gentlemen, and if they had been left free to act with the representatives of the brotherhoods themselves, in my opinion, it never would have reached the contention even of a threat of a strike. But it is the stock jugglers and manipulators, that element that is robbing not only the public but oppressing the employees of the railroads and robbing the stockholders, as in the case of the New York, New Haven & Hartford, the Rock Island, the Alton, and several other roads that have been investigated. This can be shown by the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and those are the crooks that you are protecting, and it is the men who render the great service to the country of operating and making it possible for our splendid transportation systems that you are condemning when you criticize the men who are representing the brotherhoods here in Washington, carrying out the instructions which they have from their organizations. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am well aware that a vote against this proposition to-day will be scheduled as unfriendly to organized labor and to the eight-hour day. I will submit myself or subject myself to the criticism that I am unfriendly, it matters not what has been the record in the past; having stood for the eight-hour day in the Ohio constitutional convention, having voted for it every time it came up in reference to public works here in Congress, yet if I vote against this measure to-day, it will go throughout the country that I have changed my position.

I am willing, gentlemen of the House, to subject myself to that criticism, but I want it distinctly understood that when I vote against this measure, as I shall, I am voting not against the eight-hour day, for this is not an eight-hour-day proposition.

If we would act upon the suggestions couched in the President's message, that society has pronounced in favor of eight hours on the basis of humanitarian grounds, then legislation for eight hours would stop the day's work at the end of eight hours, because it would be inhuman to compel people to work longer. There is not a man in this House but knows that there would be a storm if we would put any such proposition as that into law, that those engaged in the carrying trade shall end their day's work at the end of eight hours. Nobody claims that. You can not do that in transportation, and this is but a demand for an increase of wages, giving 10 hours' pay for 8 hours' work.

Now, that probably ought to be done. But one side says, "We can not do it upon the present basis of rates." I do not know whether they can or not. The other side says, "You must do it without reference to whether you say you can or not." Here is a point of dispute, and no one side probably has a monopoly upon the information as to the ability to carry out that contract. And here are two forces, representing the greatest industrial possibilities in the world, in a contest, both sides presenting reasonable claims. And now we find Congress in a panic-stricken situation, with one side of the controversy saying, "We want the money," and with the head of the Government saying, "I wish you could have it." That moment, with the prestige of the head of this Government back of one side of the contention, arbitration was foreclosed; and that situation is the result of a proposal which operates as a command that one side must surrender its claim of submission to arbitration. The contest here is not upon an eight-hour day. The contest here is whether in a struggle in which one side requests and the other refuses to submit the contest to an impartial bureau or tribunal for settlement in the light of facts that I do not have and you do not have, whether Congress should so act as to abandon the principle of arbitration.

I will vote against this proposition, first, because I do not want to legislate in a panic, that complicates and involves the business and the welfare of 20,000,000 of people on one side and 80,000,000 upon the other side.

I can not vote for this measure because we foreclose the possibility of an arbitration when an inevitable conflict will come again. No man is so blind as to think that this temporary measure is going to settle this controversy. No sooner will it be decided on one side before new demands will be made later on. That necessitates an impartial hearing, where facts can be brought out and legislation can be legitimate because it is intelligent and not enacted in prejudice, because somebody holds before us a threat, "If you do not give it to us by a fixed hour, we will do the worst."

I will not vote for any measure that is held up to me in that way, notwithstanding the fact that I have tried from the beginning to be fair with the people with whom I always have lived and worked, for I have no sympathy for the man who knows not toil. I know what toil means as well as any man on this floor, because I have traveled that road.

I can not vote for this measure, because it not only closes out arbitration but because it is a foolish makeshift. I want to say to my friend, whom I so much admire, the chairman of this committee, that section 2 provides for a commission and limits the time in which it shall report to not longer than nine nor shorter than six months. What are they to report on? Conditions as to the working of this proposal. It is to be a report without recommendation.

Hear me, men: Suppose the commission reports adversely to this proposal? Is there any man here so foolish as to think that that report could ever become effective? Why is it that the brotherhoods refuse to arbitrate? Listen to the statement yesterday of Mr. Garretson, the genial, able, great representative of one of the finest organizations of men that ever lived. Mr. Garretson said: "We can not arbitrate a question involving what in many places is already admitted. We have got the eight-hour day in many places. We will not throw open the question for arbitration now conceded in many places to run the risk of losing what we have."

Suppose this law were enacted, with section 2 giving the authority to the commission to report the result, and the commission should report against this proposal in section 1. The same thing would come up again. "We have had it by law; we will never surrender it by arbitration," they will say. And what will it amount to?

I can not vote for the measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before yielding to the next speaker, I desire to say that the pathetic remarks of my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] appeal to my reverence for sanctified things, but his appeal reminds me that the sanctity of arbitration has had a shifting basis in Congress.

When I came here first the men were all demanding arbitration, and the carriers were all refusing. Now, the situation has somewhat changed in their opinion as to popular support, and the railroads now suddenly have discovered the sanctity of arbitration.

We have not tried to include arbitration in this bill, because we imagine it would take about six months for everybody to agree upon an arbitration bill, and we could not get it through in time to avert the strike; and the expense that it is assumed will result from the adoption of an eight-hour law now is a bagatelle as compared with what the public would suffer every day if the strike were ordered.

It is a mistake for the gentleman to assume that the adoption of an eight-hour law would greatly increase wages. We have provided for the appointment of a commission to determine that, and to report to us at the next session of Congress.

At the next session of Congress or some subsequent session, as soon as we can when we have time, when we have learned all we can about adjusting the transportation question to the eight-hour law, when we have put the trimmings on it, when we see whether the men are being paid unconscionably high rates, when we see whether the people want them to get too much pay, and when they are getting too much pay, we will adjust everything to the eight-hour law. It is not a makeshift, it is not a temporary thing. The eight-hour law is being adopted. All the other things will be legislated about when we have time. I do not know anybody who is terror stricken. I know some people who are exercising common sense, and I think it behooves all of us to concur in action which is sensible, and to do what is necessary to do at the present time and postpone that which is not necessary to do now for the purpose of debating it when we have more time. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] five minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there has been any piece of legislation which has come before the House at this session as important as this which we are now considering. I myself am deeply interested in this legislation. For 20 years prior to my coming to Congress I sat in a locomotive cab on the Pennsylvania lines. If I have time, in just a few minutes I would like to explain the proceedings of this controversy to the Members of this House, if I can. It seems that several months ago the four organizations of the railway brotherhoods met together and decided to take concerted action and go before their employers for the betterment of their condition. They met with their employers and were in session with them for month after month. Finally it came to the point where neither the employer nor employee could agree on what the other wanted, and they gave up the negotiations, and the grant officers of the organizations sent word back to the representatives of those organizations, telling them just the condition they were in. In the meantime they sent out the strike order to have it voted upon by the members of the brotherhoods, and about 94 per cent of all the employees of those great organizations voted for a strike in case the operators would not grant to them the concessions which they asked for.

Then President Wilson called the heads of those railroad organizations to Washington and submitted a certain proposition to them. They said they were not in a position to accept that proposition until they had first talked with the 640 chairmen, who were representing the various organizations throughout this country. So Mr. Wilson sent for the 640 chairmen. They came to Washington. The President submitted the proposition to them, and then they went into secret conference in one of the buildings in this city, and after a long debate a majority of those 640 delegates agreed to accept the proposition of President Wilson. Then President Wilson called in the operators, and you all know just as well as I know that they would not accede to the proposition which the President had suggested.

Now, I have heard much here to-day that this is not an eight-hour proposition, but that it is robbing the railroad companies by making them pay the employees 10 hours' wages for 8 hours' work. Under the present schedule of operating trains on the railroads the freight runs are on a 100-mile basis. They are given 10 hours in which to make 100 miles, or at the rate of 10 miles an hour. Now, the representatives of the brotherhood want a change. They believe they could make that same run in eight hours, at the rate of 12½ miles an hour for the basis. They say they can put that proposition through. They claim they can run the 100 miles in eight hours, at the rate of 12½ miles an hour. If they do that, in what way is it going to increase the expenses of the railroad operators? If they carry out that proposition they will haul their trains as far in eight hours as they have been given 10 hours in which to haul them.

I have heard much about the railroad men being the aristocratic laboring men, and the highest-paid labor in the United States.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. We have men stand up here and say that these aristocrats of labor, these men who are the highest paid mechanics in the United States, come to Congress and at the point of a gun they hold up Congress and try to make them pass this legislation. The railroad men did not ask you to pass this legislation. They did not even suggest it. There was an effort made on the part of the Chief Executive of this Nation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not do that. I will give the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Georgia has promised to yield to me two minutes. I will yield those two minutes to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I thank the gentleman. I say there was an effort on the part of the Chief Executive of the Nation to stop this strike. The question was put to the representatives of the brotherhoods. The strike order had already been sent out, and this proposition here was suggested to the brotherhood men and they were asked, if this bill were passed, would they stop the strike on Monday. They immediately said, "Yes; if you put this proposition through we will send out an order for the strike to stop, and not to be carried out on Monday next." They did not ask for this legislation. They waived the most essential thing—time and a half for overtime.

I know the conditions of the railroad men, the conditions under which they work, the conditions under which they live; and when a man is deprived of the privileges of this life, which the majority of railroad men are, going out at 5 o'clock in the morning and getting home at 9, 10, or 11 o'clock at night, Sunday and every other day, when they can not have time to associate with their families and loved ones at home like the rest of the workmen of this great country, it seems to me they have a perfect right to take the stand that they have taken in going to their employers and asking them to make their conditions better. But I want to try to impress upon this Congress, and upon you men who stood up here and said that the railroad organizations have been holding you up at the point of a gun, that they had nothing at all to do with bringing this legislation to Congress. It was suggested by your President and by your majority floor leader.

Gentlemen, we are facing a great calamity. I do not say that this bill is satisfactory to me, but if this strike comes next Monday morning it will absolutely paralyze the country. You talk about the public; what will the public do if the railroads are tied up for one week? The railroad operators say it will cost $60,000,000 to operate the railroads under this system; the railroad employees say $27,000,000. Let us be conservative and say it might cost $40,000,000. What is $40,000,000 to the people of the United States against a tie-up of the great railway systems of this country? I believe the entire country would lose more than $40,000,000 in one week's time. Gentlemen, we are facing a condition, and I realize that great responsibility rests upon us. We are facing this condition, and we must meet it one way or the other. As far as I am personally concerned, I am going to vote for this measure because I know it is the only way to avert this great crisis which is ordered to take place next Monday morning unless we pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to take one moment of time to show the history of railroad legislation and its connection with this matter. Each one of you knows that there was a revolt among the people of this country 10 or 15 years ago against conditions affecting capitalization of railroads and a revolt against excessive rates. I took a somewhat prominent part in the discussion of that question, the same as other men did, and some part in the enforcement of remedial statutes. I think you overlook some things. There was a revolt because the railroads were overcapitalized. There was a revolt because the men working for the company could not get safety appliances that they needed and deserved, and there was a revolt because the rates were too high.

We gave the men proper safety appliances; we gave them more compensation; we gave them headlight laws; we passed some laws affecting overcapitalization; and we in many cases lowered the rates. I happened to be connected with some of the rate cases against corporations and railroad companies, know something of the situation, and know that this is a wage controversy, and if this legislation is passed it will be absolutely necessary to raise railroad rates.

We were fair to the public and fair to the railroad men in the attitude we took, and the gentleman from West Virginia then was standing shoulder to shoulder with many of us looking at both sides of the question. He is now looking only at one side. He is not willing to raise the rates at the time he is raising the overhead expenses. If, without investigation, you put the railroads to this extra expense of $40,000,000, then, to be absolutely fair, it is necessary that you allow them to raise their rates. This follows, because you will not allow them to raise rates without a full hearing.

I believe that every man on this side of the House believes in an eight-hour day. This is not an eight-hour-day dispute. This is a wage dispute, and if you are going to pass legislation affecting one side you ought to be fair and pass legislation affecting the other. I am going to support the motion to recommit which will be submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], because we ought to have arbitration, and compulsory arbitration, and I want to say that I was forced to this conclusion by arguments of railroad employees. The people of the United States should never again be put up against a situation of this kind, with a shotgun held at their breast. I believe that we ought to be as fair to the railroads at this time as we have been fair to the men in the past [applause], and just as fair to the public, who will finally foot the bill. The Interstate Commerce Commission has based its rates on known expense—overhead, operating, and so forth—and if we are to undo its work it ought to be undone, it should be done, without changing the ratio of rates to expense. If this is not done, I must oppose the measure. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is another side to this question than the economic side, and that is the side that is purely political. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] declined to answer my question a little while ago. Now I propose to put up to him something that he may answer in his own time.

On July 15 last there was a slight controversy over joint resolution No. 60, an interstate-commerce resolution, during which the gentleman from Georgia was asked whether that particular resolution had anything to do with the dispute between the railroads and the employees in regard to an eight-hour day. Mr. ADAMSON said:

> Not a particle.
> Mr. HUDDLESTON. Is any action to be taken with reference to it?
> Mr. ADAMSON. The resolution relates to the method of regulating transportation corporations that do a transportation business.
> Mr. HUDDLESTON. Has the gentleman's committee any resolution before it in relation to the dispute between the railroads and the employees on that matter?
> Mr. ADAMSON. Four months ago when the clouds gathered above the horizon the Republican leader and I investigated to see whether there would be any strike. I will not say where we went, but we were assured by the representatives of the employees that there would be no walkout and they did not mean to stop the wheels, and the Interstate Commerce Commission did not favor any investigation, and I concluded that no action was necessary and dropped the subject.
> Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not put me into that agreement.

That was on July 15 of the present year, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] had the information in his possession for four months—the President told us it had been on a year—and he came to this House with the positive assurance given to him by men whom he vouched for as knowing that there would be no strike or walkout, and that there would be no necessity of an investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, in his time the gentleman from Georgia may have some explanation of that statement. This matter has certainly been pending for a long time, and it is just possible that it may have been held up until the campaign opened, so that the President and his party could make the most of it. If this was the play, apparently it has not succeeded.

The facts as they have been revealed to us here show that the President has made a muddle of it. Instead of coming out the hero of the workingmen of the country, the President appears to have aided in putting the workingmen up against a strike to the very great detriment of all the people of the United States who will be affected thereby, and from which we are expected to extricate those concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield. This legislation is being forced upon us now overnight, in spite of the fact that the administration and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had it in their power for six months to bring in some legislation that might have relieved the situation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I regret I can not yield. Each side in this controversy is endeavoring to place the responsibility for what may ensue upon the other side, but the real responsibility for the deplorable condition, for the strike itself, if it should occur, will rest largely upon the present incumbent of the White House, although I am inclined to include with him the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the genial gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who assured us last July that no strike would take place.

Mr. Chairman, for 12 years we have had in effect a law under which Federal officials mediated disputes of this kind and brought about arbitration where arbitration failed. During all those years the board never failed to secure a settlement, and no President ever before saw fit to inject himself into the controversy and take it out of the hands of the board provided by law to handle it. And just here let us call as witnesses our distinguished labor Representative from Illinois, Mr. BUCHANAN, upon the Democratic side, and our locomotive engineer friend, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. COOPER, on the Republican side, who tell us in substance, in the speeches they have just made, that if the Executive had "kept his nose" out of this situation there would have been no need for any legislation by Congress at all. [Applause on the Republican side.] But when the present situation developed to a degree that it became threatening, the word began to come out through the papers, not only that "the President was watching the situation closely" but that he was prepared to take a hand when the time came and bring about a settlement, if the provisions of the mediation law should fail.

When the brotherhoods' leaders returned their strike vote to New York and resumed conferences with the managers' committee, it was realized that a critical situation was developing. Under the law either side had a right to invoke the offices of the Board of Medition, and under the law the board had a right to proffer its offices if they were not invoked. The board knew or might be presumed to know, better than anyone else, the real situation when the time had arrived for it to proffer its services. The board did finally start for New York to offer its services, and within an hour after it had left, the announcement was handed out from the White House to the press that the board had gone to New York under the President's direction, and again the public was assured that if the board failed the President stood ready to take a hand. Why should it have been announced that the board had gone to New York at the President's order? The duty and a solemn obligation rested on the board to go when the situation became critical, and the statement that the board was acting under the President's orders, that he was closely following the case and was prepared to act if the board failed, was not only unnecessary but was in the highest degree mischievous. In effect, it practically guaranteed in advance that the efforts of the board would fail. How could it be otherwise?

Whether the White House was called in or "butted in" at this critical time, expecting to settle this strike for political advantage in the campaign, may be questioned, but the White House got in and achieved a dead failure. Then this House, which had been told there would be no strike, was called to the rescue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman did not ask a question, I can not answer any, for I can not answer a question that has not been asked. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] for five minutes.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, instead of being an occasion for harsh words or recriminations, I believe the House of Representatives ought this day to realize that the men who are in charge of operating trains in the United States, if they are willing to accept the mild and gentle provisions of this bill, are the most patriotic body of men under the flag. They deserve the universal praise and commendation of all good citizens. Every one of these railroad men is a man. They represent the brain and brawn and intelligence of that great husky legion known as American workingmen. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to gentlemen on the other side, without any bitterness, that you are wrong when you say that those men ever threatened or held up Congress. They have done no such thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to you that you are wrong when you say that they have conspired with the President of the United States to arrange a favorable political situation for him in this campaign. It is untrue, and there is not a word or line to substantiate it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] This controversy has been going on for weeks, and I am going to propound the question to you, and I want you to answer it. What would have happened if the President and you and I and we who are here in Washington were unable to do anything with this situation? What would have happened? What would happen one minute after 12 o'clock next Sunday night? Who would stop it? Would you do it? Would your speeches do it? Would your abuse of the President do it? I say to you that nothing you could do would prevent it; and I am amazed, delighted beyond measure, that that great body of patriotic American citizens, those brave men who take their lives in their hands every day, are willing to accept the terms of this legislation [applause on the Democratic side] which is here now offered for the purpose of averting the most terrible calamity that can be imagined.

Do not let us forget the woman who is at home, whose husband is on the rails to-night—the woman who is praying for the father of her children. Let us not forget the mother who calls upon Him—

> Who stills the raven's clam'rous nest,
> And decks the lily fair in flowery pride.

We have to remember her; we have to remember her family; and at the present cost of living, if her husband has demanded sufficient wages to secure the necessaries of life for her and for their children, I am for him, and I am for this bill, and for every measure that will better the condition of that brave man and his wife and children. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This bill does not affect any man who works only eight hours. We say an engineer gets a great salary. If he does, and he runs only eight hours a day, there is not a cent in this bill for him. We say that a conductor gets a great salary. If he runs only eight hours a day, there is nothing in this bill for him. There is nothing in this bill for any man whose time is not taken up more than eight hours a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, or do I understand the gentleman from Illinois objects to such requests?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object.

Mr. TAGGART. Then I withdraw the request.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill in its present form, and I shall vote against it.

Since I have been in Congress I have voted for all legislation that I believed would benefit labor, but I do not believe this measure is in the real interest of the laboring man. It may, and in all probability it will, avoid a strike temporarily, but in my opinion this would be merely postponing the actual settlement of the whole matter.

I am receiving many communications from employees of the railroads who are not trainmen, and in every instance I am appealed to to act and vote against this proposed legislation.

I will hurriedly read one or two of these communications, showing the attitude of these men:

> I see by this evening's papers that President Wilson has addressed Congress advocating the passage of a law limiting the hours of employment of employees of railroads engaged in interstate traffic to eight hours a day. As a law of this character, if passed, would limit the earning capacity of all railroad employees, especially of the poor class who can only make an honest dollar by the sale of his labor, and being one of these unfortunates I hope that you will not only vote but use your influence against the passage of such a law.

Another letter reads:

> I desire you to know that I am not in favor of a law compelling the railroads to give trainmen of a certain class an eight-hour day. If, however, such legislation is forced upon them, it should be broad enough in its scope to include not only the men who assign trainmen to their respective runs but also those employees who assign telegraph and telephone operators to their tours of duty—men who are not affiliated with any organization. The present arrangement for the last named is for one man (myself) to be in charge continuously during the day and night, and while not actually on duty continuously, it is practically so, inasmuch as I am subject to call at all hours. More thought and actual work is required in such positions than is necessary for the operators affected by the present Federal hours-of-service law.

Mr. Chairman, if this bill is enacted into law it will affect thousands of American citizens not employees of the railroad companies. Dividends may be passed or reduced, and the stockholders, many of whom are men and women who have invested their small earnings in railroad stocks in the belief that by so doing they have safeguarded themselves from poverty in their old age, will find their small incomes seriously affected, if not cut off entirely, by this hasty legislation.

It is my earnest desire that justice be done to all concerned in this extremely grave situation, and I do not believe the enactment into law of the bill we have before us will result in justice to either employees or stockholders. It is a makeshift, pure and simple, and will only defer the evil day of further disturbance when we shall be called upon to mete out exact justice. Nothing is settled until it is settled right. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back a minute and a half.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, but in doing so I feel, in justice to myself, I should make a statement. There are three parties to this controversy—the railroads, which virtually means the capital invested in them; the railway employees; and the public. The railroads are entitled to facilities of operation and to earn a sufficient income to pay a fair return upon the capital invested and to maintain an adequate reserve. The employees are entitled to receive a fair wage and to work under conditions which are hygienic and which will promote their physical well-being. The public are entitled to continuous service of this public utility and to such ample facilities for transportation of traffic and the movement of passengers as the capacity of the railroads will admit. The rights of the public in any controversy between employees and employers are, and of right ought to be, paramount. It is because their right is paramount to continuous service of the railroads and because we are confronted by a condition which can not be met by theories that I shall vote for this bill; and I think it ought to receive the unanimous consideration of the House. But at the same time there is one phase of this matter the consideration of which I can not escape. We are voting for this under constraint. As Representatives of the public and not of the capital of the railroads nor of the employees, we recognize that the public are confronted by a condition which, if the threat to strike is carried out, means suffering and disaster to the commercial and industrial interests as well as to the life of the people of the country. I would like to take up my remaining time and speak a word for the public. Let us not forget that in adopting an 8-hour day with 10-hour pay we are increasing the wages of 400,000 employees 25 per cent, and the pro rata pay for overtime is an increase of 25 per cent over the former pro rata pay. There are 1,600,000 railroad employees not members of the four brotherhoods, and who are not affected by this legislation. I can not say at this time, and it is unnecessary to say, how much that will increase the operating expenses of the railroads; but the public must understand that if this increased burden of operating expenditure prevents the railroads from earning a fair net income upon their capital invested and to maintain a reserve, that we are going beyond our constitutional power, and that they have the right to resort to the courts in order that no confiscatory conditions shall be imposed upon them. If we proceed upon the theory that instead of their appealing to the courts to set aside this legislation because it is confiscatory, that the railroads will appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase freight rates, we must face the contingency that such rates may be raised, and it would be the duty of the commission to do so if the net revenues of the railroads were not sufficient. The public, through Congress, should deal fairly with employees, but, at the same time, it can not impair contracts nor confiscate capital.

While we are voting for an eight-hour day, as representatives of the public we must realize that it increases the pay of 400,000 employees 25 per cent, and we must face the condition of the future raising of freight rates. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, and when we find we need more rates we have a commission, specially constituted by law, to fix all reasonable and just rates, and Congress will be always here to take care of the railroads, both their officers and operatives of trains, and see that they are all treated right.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the railroads are the great arteries through which flows the lifeblood of our social and commercial system. They supply us with food and raiment and machinery, with newspapers and magazines, and they make it possible for a nation of 100,000,000 of people to live in neighborly communion and to unite on the basis of a common understanding for the accomplishment of those things which make for the welfare of the Nation and for the individual.

While the railroads exist by virtue of a partnership between private capital and the sovereign right of the State, their ownership is invested in a larger sense in all the people, to whose existence they have become almost as necessary as air and sunlight. Neither the executive heads nor the men who do the actual physical work of operation should possess the power arbitrarily to close up these great arteries of social and commercial life and thus visit incalculable loss and suffering upon all.

Mr. Chairman, I voted to uphold the President of the United States in the matter of the McLemore resolution because a principle was involved, that of standing up for a right possessed by every citizen of this Republic. We were solemnly warned on the floor of this House that if some such measure as the McLemore resolution were not passed, this country would be involved in war with a foreign nation. I wanted no war, none of us wanted war, but I for one, war or no war, was not willing to see an American right trampled upon. The situation confronting us to-day in the measure under discussion is somewhat analogous. We have been notified by the President of the United States that if we do not pass certain legislation within a certain time a small body of men will tie up our railroads, paralyze our industries, shut off our people from the food they need for subsistence, and submit all of us to great discomfort, inconvenience, and possible sickness and death. Sir, a principle is here involved as there was a principle involved in the question brought up by the McLemore resolution. Shall any body of men be allowed, even though they be our own citizens, to trample with impunity upon a common right possessed by the people of this country? It may be that they will do so, it may be that they will for a time succeed in so doing, but if they will so do and so succeed it shall not be without my protest as an American citizen and as a Member of this body.

It is as a Member of this body, however, that I wish to make a still more serious protest. The Congress is one of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government, possessing distinct and independent rights as outlined by the Constitution. The membership of the House of Representatives, the lower branch of Congress, consists of 435 men elected by the people and representing all the people of the United States. Even the Chief Executive of the Nation, in whose hands rests the duty of enforcing the laws, possesses few constitutional rights with reference to this body further than to give it information of the state of the Union and to recommend consideration of such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. Yet, in spite of this fact, a small, unofficial body of our people have served notice on us along with the President that unless we enact certain legislation for their particular benefit between now and to-morrow evening, they will proceed to call their contemplated strike on the railroads. Mr. Chairman, if we accede to this demand what shall become of the legally constituted lawmaking power of this Government? How soon again may we not expect that another body of citizens, representing other interests but possessing similar power, shall confront us with similar demands? Shall we, by passing this measure to-day, confess our impotence, surrender our rights as Members of this great National Legislature, and be false to our oath and our duty to the people? I, for one, will not be a party to the establishment of a precedent of this kind with its enormous possibilities of danger to our country and its institutions.

Let no one gain the idea from what I have said that I am opposed to an eight-hour day. Let no one assume that I am an opponent of laboring men or labor unions. I have as much at heart the interests of the man who toils for a living as has any other Member of this House. I hold no brief for the railroads. In all probability a majority of the members of the four brotherhoods whose demands we are considering are possessed of more of this world's goods than I am. In all probability a majority of them received as much common-school education as I did. I have been thrown into intimate association with union labor men for the last 20 years, and I think I understand, perhaps better than the average man, their desires and ambitions and aspirations. I agree with the suggestion that there has been a somewhat general acceptance of the idea that eight hours should constitute a day's work and that this rule should be applied to the railroad business if it can be practically adjusted to the peculiar conditions of that business. But I am thoroughly convinced that the questions at issue in the present controversy should be submitted to orderly and deliberate investigation and arbitration, in which the interests of all the parties concerned should be given full consideration. I believe it to be in the interests of good government, of the due process of law, and of all the guaranties of the Constitution with reference to the rights of person and property that this Congress should now establish a body whose duty it shall be to investigate and arbitrate these great labor disputes, and should go no further at the present time. At all events, neither for political advantage nor for any other similar reason will I bow my head in subjection to the influence which to-day is arbitrarily threatening the welfare of the people of the United States and the power and usefulness of the United States Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, while this measure may not be all that some could desire; while it may fall short of that perfection which longer deliberation might assure; and while some of the criticisms which have been leveled at it by our Republican friends may be not wholly without justification, it is, nevertheless, one that should command general support in meeting an emergency which all of us understand and which calls for instant action.

I can conceive of no greater calamity which could befall this country, short of an armed invasion by a powerful enemy, than that which was scheduled to come off Monday morning next. This calamity, we are assured, will be averted by what we are here proposing to do. There is no claim for the pending bill that it is final; that it is anything more than temporary; that it is other than a mere expedient in caring for a situation which has alarmed every thoughtful man in America. It can be opposed only by those who would prefer the horrors of an unparalleled industrial war to an adjustment which will give all parties concerned an opportunity to look around and to seek a proper way out of an intolerable situation.

Mr. Chairman, if time permitted, I would like to discuss at some length some of the issues which have presented themselves in connection with the crisis which we are aiming to avert. One thing I hope to say very briefly, and that is that railway rates have little relation to railway pay. Has it been forgotten that the late Mr. Vanderbilt bluntly asserted that rates were governed solely by what the traffic would bear? Or is it forgotten that to-day, under regulation, rates remain practically at what capitalization permits?

It is regretted that time does not allow me to go further into this, for I think it can be shown that practically rates are still substantially governed by what the traffic will bear. As far as wages, the pay of railroad help, goes, what is the governing force here? Can they be regulated by law? Can even the railroads themselves determine how much they will pay? In the last analysis it will be found that wages are governed, not by chance, not by legislation, not by organization, not by anything in the world except natural law. What the man who employs his own labor on the best free land in use can obtain is, after all, the basis of all other wages. Anything which may tend to increase what the man at the margin is able to secure tends inevitably to lift wages all up the line from the lowest to the highest.

But I can not dwell on this very vital point. All I can do is to cite it and ask that it be considered fairly, not for any effect it may have on the pending measure, but for the good it may do when the larger questions come up for settlement after the present emergency has passed. It seems to me that we should look fundamentals in the face. We should inquire into the whole philosophy of wages, trying to ascertain the law governing them, avoiding errors which it is so easy to adopt, keeping clear of pitfalls into which it is so easy to stumble. It is no part of legislation to undertake to fix wages or to regulate prices. Our whole system, as far as it seeks to do either of these things, is false, and its mischievous tendencies are apparent. Legislation will have fulfilled its mission when it shall have made it impossible for a few to engross and forestall opportunity and establish a monopoly of natural resources by which and from which all wealth must be drawn by labor. Denial to labor of access to these opportunities and resources is at the bottom of all industrial troubles. Were labor free to employ itself when the terms offered by the employer were unsatisfactory, labor would be absolutely independent; it could freely dictate the conditions of its employment; it could always command wages equal to what it would be able to produce if self-employed.

However, we are not now at the point where this phase of the question is presented for discussion. We are dealing with a great emergency, with a condition fraught with enormous possibilities of evil; and we are dealing with it courageously and in a way that must meet the approval of all who do not want to see the country thrown into an industrial chaos. Perhaps this is what some of our Republican friends would like to see. Out of such a chaos some order in their political affairs might conceivably come. But they are not to be gratified. We have taken hold of this matter firmly and without fear. And for one I am willing to abide the issue. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has six minutes and the gentleman from New Jersey has three minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, in three minutes one can only give expression to one's faith and not advance an argument on a proposition of this kind. There can only be one substitute motion offered, and that is to authorize the President of the United States to seize the railroads and run them for the Nation. The Republicans will offer nothing of the sort, I am sure. If we legislate in a panic now, it is because most of us have for years refused to recognize the existence of the irrepressible, industrial conflict. Every voice has been heretofore heard in Congresses except the voice of the great working masses. It is the first time that we have the visible government assert itself. It is the first time that the working people, in a rather vulgar way, say, "We are here; we are going to strike; we are going to exercise our right to promote and improve our condition." They do not ask you for legislation; they announce they will exercise their inalienable right and you are at a loss; you do not know what to do. You have been talking protection and free trade, you have been talking of all sorts of things except industrial problems, and most of you do not know how to go about this thing at all. Some have even gone to the extent of blaming the President of the United States because he considered it his sacred duty, as trustee of the welfare of this country, to offer a remedy for this situation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why be partisan in an emergency of this kind? The railroads are not in a position to denounce the action of the Chief Executive. It is they that have denied his offer; it is they that have refused to listen to his voice of counsel. It is the railroads that have refused to recognize the economic and ethical principle of the eight-hour day. They are not in a position to criticize, and, please, gentlemen, do not you dare talk about compulsory arbitration, and let no one of you imagine that the working people of the United States will stand for compulsory arbitration. Compulsory arbitration is as indefensible and impossible as compulsory marriage. Only a short while ago in Sweden the workers organized a nation-wide strike against a compulsory arbitration act, and, as I understand it, they called off the strike only after the promise of the Government had been given that the law would be repealed as soon as the military necessity would be over. Let us vote for this measure, because it offers a remedy for a very serious and critical situation. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. There is no other way to it just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks by adding to my remarks the bill introduced by Victor Berger, a Member of the Sixty-second Congress, dealing with the program of nationalizing the railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the bill indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has three minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has three minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, it has been said that a condition, not a theory, confronts us, the condition being a threat to stop the wheels of industry and commerce all over the country and place our cities in a state of siege, with starvation impending as a result of cutting off supplies of food. Whence comes this threat? From a foreign power? No; from a group of four men, armed with authority to call a strike on all the great railroads, the date for which has been set for next Monday. These four men—or, shall I say, the President of the United States, in fear of the votes they may influence in the coming campaign—having refused to agree to arbitration, now demand that the Congress of the United States shall abdicate its position as a deliberative representative body and pass this bill forthwith. I, for one, decline to be either bluffed or coerced into participation in hasty, ill-considered, makeshift legislation, the far-reaching effects of which we can not foresee, though I believe that our industries should work toward eight hours as the limit of the usual day's labor, where the hours can be so fixed. It has, however, been freely admitted by some of the spokesmen on the other side that the hours of labor in train operation can not be so fixed, and that this bill is a bill of doubtful constitutionality to increase wages rather than to decrease hours.

Mr. Chairman, I think I know railroad men well enough to know that they do not want to strike. If you gentlemen will forego for a time your habit of riding on palace cars and parlor cars and other Pullman productions and will ride occasionally in the smokers, filling your pipes and sitting down alongside of the trainmen, you will be in a position to know how they feel. You will find that the average trainman or conductor, while he rightly desires shorter hours, does not want to strike, and stands almost as much in dread of a strike as the average Member of Congress fears the present situation, which is saying a good deal. [Laughter.] Unless I am a poor judge of human nature, the four brotherhood chiefs do not want to call a strike, and are demanding this legislation to save their faces. I sympathize with the predicament in which they have been placed, but I am not responsible for it. Under other circumstances I might vote for such a measure as this, if made a part of a well-considered bill which contained also provisions to prevent such a situation from arising again and treated all parties, including the public, fairly.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States is largely responsible for the position in which the labor leaders and this Congress find themselves to-day. I do not like to charge him with playing politics with an emergency, but I do wish to say that it seems to me that it is unwise for Woodrow Wilson to try to play Theodore Roosevelt. In the first place, he does not know how to keep in touch with the sentiment of the people as Mr. Roosevelt did and does, and, in the second place, he has not the backbone. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield that to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the nonmembers or unorganized workingmen in the railroad industry. There have been statements that they are not in harmony with the brotherhoods' efforts in securing an eight-hour day.

The fact is that the brotherhoods have taken a vote of their nonmembers as well as of their members. I have here the figures of the vote of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, showing a vote of their members in favor of the eight-hour day 98,557, as against 3,256. Of these men who are talked about as being opposed to the eight-hour day, the nonmembers of the union, there were 29,481 for the eight-hour day and 1,060 against. The vote of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, which is one of the four brotherhoods, was 96.73 per cent in favor of the eight-hour day.

Now, the other industries and the other workmen are organized, the telegraphers, and the machinists, and the bridgemen, the carpenters, and blacksmiths; 60 per cent of the men outside of the brotherhoods are organized and are working in harmony with them to secure the eight-hour day.

The representatives of the railroads are putting much emphasis on the fact that they want to stand by the principle of arbitration. If gentlemen will look at the records of the railroad corporations they will find that they have refused to arbitrate with every labor organization that is not strong enough to tie up their works. That was true in the case of the machinists' strike on the Santa Fe. The union machinists used every influence to secure arbitration. The railroads have refused to arbitrate. Their contention that they are standing out for the principle of arbitration is a deception and a fraud. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning December 1, 1916, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to know if it would be in order to offer an amendment now or after the bill is read?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be in order to offer an amendment at the end of the reading of the paragraph.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That beginning December 1, 1916, eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for services of all employees who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad which is subject to the provisions of the act of February 1, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in any capacity in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, there are three committee amendments to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 3, by striking out, after the word "beginning," the words "December 1, 1916," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "January 1, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is an error to have the time begin January 1 instead of December 1. Beginning about December 1 or January 1 is the hardest time to try out a new method or to apply the eight-hour day, because at that time there is less freight and more bad weather and many elements to contend with that would perhaps make it appear that it was not successful; or, in other words, it would be holding the application of the eight-hour day responsible for the elements of the weather.

However, if this is necessary to secure harmony and expedite action, I do not care to make any effort or protest against the adoption of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] wishes to offer a modification of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The one that was just adopted?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; the next amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] proposes to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PAGE of North Carolina: "After the word 'railroad,' in line 8, page 1, insert 'except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, or electric interurban railways.'"

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I trust this amendment will not be adopted. As I understand the purpose of this bill, it is to meet an emergency. I believe the bill as drafted by the committee will prevent a strike on Monday, but I think I am safe in saying that the adoption of such amendments as the one proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], unless they are very carefully safeguarded, may destroy the effect of this legislation. This amendment is presented without any opportunity to determine what the effect will be.

Mr. COLEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Pardon me, but I can not yield at this time. This amendment, as I say, is presented without an effort to consider who will be affected by it or how far it will go to nullify the provisions of this measure. My attention was called a short time ago to the fact that certain railroads have electrified their systems in such a way that if you attempt to exclude electric roads from the operations of this act you are very likely to destroy the purpose of it. I trust the gentleman from Georgia, who is in charge of this bill, will permit us to pass the bill substantially as it has been brought into this House. And my reason for that is that I believe it is such a simple bill it will readily be understood, and because I believe the passage of the bill as presented to this House will guarantee industrial peace in this country, and that is what I am seeking.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that the New Haven is practically electrified from New York to Boston?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know. I have not been over the road. I do not know what the effect of the amendment will be. With all due respect to the chairman of the committee, I question if he has had an opportunity to determine the effect of this amendment. The bill as it stands has been carefully considered. The bill as it stands will prevent a strike on Monday. I am not prepared to say what will be the effect if these suddenly presented and hastily considered amendments be put in.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield a moment there?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Take the Pennsylvania Railroad, and part of the way, going from here to New York, it is drawn by an electric engine instead of a steam engine. What effect would that amendment have on it?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know. I do not know of any reason why a man who works on a railroad that is less than 100 miles long should work more than eight hours a day. He works just as hard on a railroad that is 90 miles long as the man who is employed on a railroad 500 miles long. I contend that when a gentleman comes in here and offers an amendment he ought to submit a bill of particulars so we may know what we are doing.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered not in its present form but as it affected street railway and interurban electric lines, by the committee, and in that far is not my amendment but the committee's amendment. At my request the chairman of the committee has accepted a suggestion of mine that small, independently owned and operated railroads, not exceeding 100 miles in length, should be included with street railways and interurban electric lines.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY] asked a question of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] relative to one of the great trunk lines that is a part of the way run by electricity. That can in no sense be termed an interurban line or a street railway line. And when the gentleman refers to the fact that employees on short lines have as hard or as long work as on the trunk line of railroads I would remind the gentleman that there are a great many short, independently owned lines in the United States where, if this automatic arbitrary increase of compensation of 25 per cent to its employees is forced upon them, they will probably be in the hands of a receiver, as many of them are now. With most of them their employees are not in the brotherhood. They are not organized. There are great stretches of country undeveloped that are being developed by private capital by the construction of small railroads for the development of these outlying portions of the country. And the purpose of this amendment is to except street railways, interurban electric lines, and railroads independently owned and operated, not in excess of 100 miles in length. And I do not believe it is the purpose even of these enthusiastic gentlemen, who say we must take the dose straight, to include these small roads and break down their operation, that means as much to the undeveloped communities of this country as railroad transportation does for the trunk lines and the developed portions of the country. And I believe this amendment ought to be adopted.

As to its not having been thought out, possibly the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has not thought it out, but other gentlemen have, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of not only the private capital invested in these small railroads, but for the development of those sections of our country now undeveloped and the protection of these small properties independently owned and operated this amendment ought to be agreed to.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TAGGART. I move to strike out the last word.

I have the greatest sympathy with the aims and objects of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], but we must remember that this Congress has no power to legislate for street railway companies that are not interstate lines of railroad or connected with interstate lines of railroad.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. KEATING. I want to ask you if there is anything in this bill which undertakes to legislate for railroads that are outside of the jurisdiction of Congress? In other words, will not those roads automatically be taken out of the operations of this bill?

Mr. TAGGART. This bill will reach the case of a street railroad or system that crosses the State line and will not reach the case of a railroad which does not cross a State line without it is connected in some way with an interstate railway line. Now, for instance, this bill as it reads would have no effect on the street railways of Seattle, San Francisco, or Los Angeles. It would take immediate effect on the street railways in the city of New York that extend into Connecticut and New Jersey. It might have no effect on the street railways of Buffalo, Pittsburgh, or New Orleans.

Mr. MANN. Pittsburg, Kans.?

Mr. TAGGART. Pittsburg, Kans., is not in my district. It did not even go Republican. It went Socialist, and so you and I will not worry about its street railroads. [Laughter.]

Now, the bill as it reads and without amendment applies to a few cities and it does not apply to the street railroads of the great majority of the cities. It has nothing to do with Cleveland, Ohio, or Pittsburgh, Pa., but it does reach Chicago, nearly all of whose lines reach down into Indiana. It does reach Kansas City, Mo., and all of its lines. I would like to see the eight-hour law apply to every one of them, but if you leave this bill as it stands, and without amending it so as to omit street railways, it shows you are attempting to legislate for railroads wholly within a State, and you can not do it. It might vitiate the whole bill. It would be a delight to some courts in this country that I could mention to hold that the bill was absolutely unconstitutional and void for that reason.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, so far as this amendment is concerned, my own personal opinion was at first that it ought not to have been incorporated. I learned, however, on investigation, that the Senate committee insisted on it, and I have been informed by those who profess to know that the people engaged in operating the street railroads and the interurban roads are not involved in this controversy at all. I also have some knowledge of these roads that are shorter than the ordinary division of 100 miles, and the information I have is that they could hardly consume eight hours anyway in making a run. And there is no use to cripple them by incorporating them in it.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. As soon as I finish this statement I will yield. We consented to the adoption of this amendment on those ideas, and if we should strike it out, I am told the Senate committee insist on putting it in, and it would be necessary to have a conference. So far as I am concerned I do not care about it one way or the other.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman says that on these short roads it is impossible to use eight hours. In that case, what harm does it do?

Mr. ADAMSON. I did not say it was impossible. I said they could hardly do it.

Mr. KEATING. And if it is possible to use more than eight hours, why should not the men get the benefit of it?

Mr. ADAMSON. It occurs to me that they could observe the law more easily than anybody else.

Mr. STERLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. STERLING. Is this the same amendment that the committee put in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. A part of it is. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] wants to amend that by adding these short lines, which provision is also in the Senate bill.

Mr. STERLING. Personally, I have no objection to that, but certainly we ought to insist on the House voting on the amendment the committee put in this morning.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman insists on that form, I will let the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I am not asking that it be considered now.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. ADAMSON. Yielding to the suggestion of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], I suggest that we pursue the ordinary method.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois is satisfied.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right then.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 8, by inserting after the word "railroad" the following: "except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, and electric interurban railways."

Mr. ADAMSON. That same amendment will occur at the top of the next page after the word "trains," and I ask unanimous consent that both amendments be voted on at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman states that the same amendment in verbiage will occur on the next page. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 2, line 1, after the word "trains," by inserting the following: "except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, and electric interurban railways."

Mr. MANN. I do not think that is where that comes in.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is right. It should come in in line 2, after the word "railroads."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the amendment just reported may be considered as pending, and as being offered after the word "railroad," in line 2, page 2, to be voted on in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can offer it to both.

Mr. MANN. That would not affect this unanimous consent.

Mr. KEATING. If that is understood, I will not object——

Mr. MANN. It will not.

Mr. KEATING. As long as I have the opportunity to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Now the debate on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], and on amendments thereto has been exhausted.

Mr. KEATING. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let the gentleman offer it without debate.

Mr. KEATING. No; with debate. I think, under the circumstances, I should have an opportunity to explain the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can offer his amendment and then be heard on it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course, he has that right.

Mr. KEATING. This amendment reads:

Except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, and electric interurban railways.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman offer his amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Now, I want to move to strike out the words:

Railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length.

My object in moving to strike out those words is that if the House puts that amendment into the bill——

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have the amendment reported from the desk in the orderly way.

Mr. KEATING. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that is offered to the last amendment?

Mr. KEATING. To the first amendment.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. To both.

Mr. KEATING. To both.

Mr. BENNET. May we have the language of the amendment reported as it would read if the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado were adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Except electric street railways and electric interurban railways.

Mr. KEATING. I wish to strike out the language that would exempt railroads less than 100 miles in length. I do that because it is utterly impossible to bring about a solution of the problem before us if that amendment is placed in the bill. The reason is that the brotherhoods have a great number of men employed on roads that would come under that provision, and they are making a fight for all the members of their brotherhoods.

This is a cleverly devised scheme which, if adopted, will place the railroad brotherhoods in the position of agreeing to an eight-hour day for some of their members and not insisting on it for other members.

In addition to that, there is no reason why the switchman who happens to be working for a great terminal company, which would be exempted by the gentleman's amendment, should be compelled to work 10 hours a day while his fellow switchman who works for some other company works 8 hours a day. To my mind there is no argument that can be advanced in support of the gentleman's proposition which could not be advanced in opposition to the entire bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Take a belt road of less than 100 miles in any of the great cities that is privately owned, and it would apply to it, would it not?

Mr. KEATING. I presume so, and I presume that is the intention.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman cites a belt road in any city. It would no come under the bill as originally framed, would it?

Mr. CULLOP. It would if engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. KEATING. My sole desire, Mr. Chairman, is to secure an eight-hour day for the men who work on the railroads in this country, and next to that I want to avoid a railroad strike. Now, why adopt an amendment which may in the last analysis prove fatal to an agreement. Why not reject it and proceed with the bill in its original form?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is entitled "A bill to establish an eight-hour day for employees and carriers," but there is no pretense in the bill itself that it does, or even tends toward the establishment of an eight-hour day. All the literature and investigation on the subject of eight-hour labor is wasted so far as the terms in this bill are concerned. The bill provides that eight hours shall, in contracts for labor and service, be deemed a day's work, and the measure or standard of a day's work for the purpose of reckoning compensation.

People differ as to whether it is desirable for men to work only 8 hours a day, or whether a man who has 8 hours' day labor in the end will be able to accomplish as much as he would if he worked 10 hours, and probably become less vitally strong physically. But the only purpose of this bill is to have Congress write into law and into contracts already made a provision that for the purpose of compensation 8 hours shall be a day's labor. There is no intention on the part of either the railroad managers or the railroad employees to shorten the hours of labor from those now used.

In the contest between the employer and employee upon the railroad the public is somewhat interested. The railroad managers would just as lief give a day's pay for 4 hours as they would for 8 or 10 hours if they could recoup themselves from the public. It is idle to say that you can receive the rate of pay without in some way increasing the rates for freight and passengers in the United States. You can not build and operate railroads without capital and without money. I do not know whether the rate of pay of the railroad employees should be increased, but I feel very confident that if the rate of pay of the engineers and conductors on passenger and freight trains ought to be increased, that it is true it would be claimed that the pay of the trackmen maintaining the track should be increased. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not believe that Congress, with doubtful constitutional power to change or alter contracts or to determine the rate of pay on transportation lines, without knowledge, without investigation, should impose a burden upon the whole people of the land. And I do not doubt—and I say it with sorrow—that if it had been proposed in this body that the rate of pay should be increased 50 per cent instead of 25 per cent, or even 100 per cent, the same gentlemen who will vote for the increase of 25 per cent under the same pressure would vote for an increase of 50 or 100 per cent, hoping that the public, at least, would not wake up to the fact that the burden is put upon them until after the next election. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, finding an existing controversy which threatened strife and disorder, interposed his good offices. He failed to obtain a satisfactory solution of the problem. He came before Congress a few days ago with the suggestion that he would turn the matter over to the legislative body of the country, with certain recommendations which he made to it.

I believe that I could have voted for the President's program if proposed in a bill before the House. Although it was not a very satisfactory solution to me, although it proposed to impose burdens upon the public in the future, it at least made the pretense of an effort to prevent similar situations in the future. But the President, as he always has in his conduct of affairs of the country when he has real questions before him, wabbled and wavered. Bold as he was in asserting his views before Congress here a day or two ago, he now backs water, as shown from his then program, and now urges Congress to pass a bill which leaves out most of the essential things which he then proposed.

My colleague, Mr. STERLING, expects to offer an amendment to the bill, and offer also a motion to recommit along the same lines, if the amendment be not agreed to in committee, attempting to prevent strikes in the future without investigation, which amendment will provide that if men will not mediate, if men will not arbitrate, either the managers or the employees, the President of the United States shall appoint a commission to investigate, and that pending the report from that commission there can be by combination neither a lockout nor a strike. [Applause on the Republican side.] If we are to meet the situation in the country, if we are to be true to the great mass of the people of the country, if we are going to yield to the emergencies of the present moment, we ought at least to do something toward preventing disaster in the future. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, just one word, please. I would like to state, as did the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], that I believe the adoption of this amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will defeat the whole purpose of this bill. I believe it would be a grave mistake to embody such an amendment in the bill. I have information almost direct from the representatives of the men——

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman any objection to that portion of the amendment which excludes interurban trolley lines?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It is not a question of whether I have objections or not. The representatives of the brotherhoods have been asked to accept certain propositions. It is a compromise upon their part. They have been shown certain bills which, if passed, they say would stop this strike. We are now trying to legislate for the purpose of preventing a strike on next Monday, and I am of the opinion, with the information that I have, that if this amendment is included in this bill it defeats that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 72, noes 91.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. KEATING to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 90.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, has debate been exhausted upon this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted.

Mr. IGOE. Is it in order to move to strike out the last two words?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion has already been made.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, are there any other amendments to be offered by the committee to section 1?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think those are all of the committee amendments.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that this last amendment was defeated. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], it seems to me, was very important and vital. I thought that the House would agree to it. The situation, as I understand it, for example, in the city of St. Louis, is this: There is not a railroad coming into that city, or, rather, crossing from St. Louis to East St. Louis, that runs over its own tracks. All of those trains are hauled over the Terminal Railroad Association's track, which is a local concern, with the stock controlled by the railroad companies. As I understand the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], this road, the Terminal Railroad Association, would be excepted from the operation of the law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that that road is either owned or operated independently of other roads?

Mr. IGOE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we have been trying to find that out for a good many years in St. Louis.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find out, and he will find out that it is not, because there is not one of the terminal roads that is or can be operated or owned independently.

Mr. IGOE. Let me say to the gentleman that the Terminal Railroad Association is one company, the Merchant Bridge & Terminal Co. is another company, and on top of them are two or three other companies. The railroad companies claim when they come to the city of St. Louis that they do not own it, that it is a separate corporation; and when we go on the other side they tell the people that the railroads own it. My own judgment is that it is an independent company.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly plain about that road. If it is covered by the interstate-commerce law, it makes reports; and if it is not, there is nothing that we can do about it. That is as plain as the nose on your face.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman from Illinois is not sure about it, and I feel that this amendment, the way it is worded, will exempt that terminal company and the men working for it from the operation of the law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would not an amendment of this nature cure that:

Provided, The above exception shall not apply to railways, though less than 100 miles in length, whose principal business is leasing or furnishing terminal or transfer facilities to other railways, or are themselves engaged in transfer of freight between railways and between railways and industrial plants.

Mr. IGOE. I think that would meet the situation. Let me say this: I do not oppose—in fact, I favor—the exemption of these electric interurban roads; but if there is going to be any question about this amendment exempting employees of the Terminal Railroad Association from the operation of the bill, I shall vote against the whole thing.

Mr. MANN. There is not any question at all. They will not be exempted, and the only thing this amendment will do—and I do not care what becomes of it—will be to exempt these little timber roads, or something of that sort, that are owned and operated independently, not in connection with any other road.

Mr. IGOE. Now, let me ask the gentleman: These men work for the Terminal Railroad Association and not for any railroad company. Now, then, this amendment excepts privately owned companies, and these men work for the Terminal Railroad Association; and if the road is less than 100 miles, it is exempted under this amendment.

Mr. MANN. It is not exempted unless owned and operated privately.

Mr. IGOE. I say it is.

Mr. MANN. It can not be operated independently. A terminal road could not have anything to carry on it except as it is operated in connection with railroads that connect with it.

Mr. IGOE. The contract made between the railroad companies and this terminal company is one by which the terminal company hauls its cars across the river, and this agreement, this contract——

Mr. MANN. But it is operated independently.

Mr. IGOE. It is operated by this separate corporation. It is bonded; it has its own bonds.

Mr. MANN. It is a perfectly sure thing if it is covered by the interstate-commerce law—the gentleman said he could not get reports.

Mr. IGOE. I did not say anything about getting reports; I made no such statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said he could not find out who owned it. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. IGOE. I said the city could not reach it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I present the following amendment to follow the amendment which is now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the Page amendment the following:
"Provided, That the above exception shall not apply to railways though less than 100 miles in length whose principal business is leasing or furnishing terminal or transfer facilities to other railways, or are themselves engaged in transfers of freight between railways or between railways and industrial plants."

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, would not that exception extend to electric railway companies that operate——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman's exception is too broad.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I think not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are some electric railway terminal companies operating interurban railroads.

Mr. KITCHIN. I doubt whether there are any such companies.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are electric terminal companies in large cities.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know whether I heard the reading of the gentleman's amendment correctly or not. If I did I think the gentleman wishes to put in what he did not intend. I understood as read it excepts railways no less than 100 miles——

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it applies to railroads though less than 100 miles.

Mr. STERLING. Excuse me, I heard it incorrectly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the word "railroad" instead of "railway" there.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does that except railroad terminals now?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment again reported.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Where does this leave the electric railroads?

Mr. KITCHIN. I expect it leaves them exactly where they are now in the other amendment. It does not affect them at all.

Mr. GALLAGHER. They will be dealt with.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that the word "railroad" be substituted for the word "railway."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a very slight observation. The bill now reads, "common carrier by railroad which is subject," and it is proposed to insert between "railroad" and "which" an exception to the exception and a proviso excepting that. There is a grammatical construction that will excite the curiosity of the world.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] as amended.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, can we have that amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported as amended.

The amendment as amended was reported.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois is correct. That proviso just offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] ought to go in at the end of the sentence.

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait one minute and let me make an explanation. I came in and went to the gentleman from Georgia and asked him where this should go in and he said to put it where the amendment went.

Mr. ADAMSON. I showed the gentleman where the amendment went in. It is just like the crooked log where the pig went in and landed outside the field instead of inside.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is the gentleman's grammar, not mine.

Mr. ADAMSON. It was my grammar. I ask unanimous consent to replace it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] was adopted. Is there objection to the reconsideration.

Mr. ADAMSON. If it is adopted I do not care anything about reconsidering it. I just want to replace it. We do not want it unless the Page amendment is adopted. If you vote on the Page amendment first, and it is adopted, put it at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. It would simplify matters very much if the Chair had been permitted to put that amendment some time ago, and then the other amendment was——

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] would temporarily withdraw his amendment——

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that it be temporarily withheld.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withhold that until the Page amendment is voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks to withhold that amendment until the Page amendment is voted on.

Mr. KINCHELOE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I presume I am in the same fix that several Members here are. I am against the original Page amendment, but I am for the amendment with the Kitchin amendment added. So if the Page amendment were to be voted on first and adopted, and the Kitchin amendment was defeated, there would be a confusion here with a whole lot of us.

The CHAIRMAN. The remedy of the gentleman is to object, then.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, my reasons are just as stated by the gentleman this moment. I am opposed to the Page amendment as it reads, but as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] I would vote for it. I shall object to holding it until after the vote on the Page amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] objects.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Kitchin amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] will be again reported.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] as amended.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment as amended be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment as amended will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PAGE of North Carolina as amended: Page 1, line 8, after the word "railroad," and also after the word "railroads," on page 2, line 2, insert "except railroads independently owned and operated, not exceeding 100 miles in length, electric street railways, and electric interurban railways: Provided, That the above exceptions shall not apply to railroads, though less than 100 miles in length, whose principal business is leasing or furnishing terminal or transfer facilities to other railroads or are themselves engaged in transfers of freight between railroads or between railroads and industrial plants."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that if this amendment should be adopted it be separated and the Kitchin amendment be placed at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that if the amendment as amended be adopted it shall then be separated, and then the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina be placed at the end of the section. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIMS. Will this amendment dislocate the vote on the 100-mile part of it before we vote on the other part?

The CHAIRMAN. The Kitchin amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. I mean the Page amendment, which will be voted on, as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. That was offered by way of amendment. The gentleman from Colorado offered an amendment to strike that out, and that was voted on. The question is on the Page amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Kitchin amendment will be placed at the end of the section. Has the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] any further amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. No further other than to make that transfer which has already been agreed upon. There may be a little verbiage to change.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in the amendment just voted on the word "railroads" be substituted for the word "railways." I see that the Page amendment reads "railways."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that in the Page amendment the word "railroads" may be substituted for the word "railways" wherever the word "railways" occurs. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock my colleague [Mr. STERLING] be permitted to offer an amendment as a new section. I make the request because I do not know whether we will get through the bill at that time or not.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to his offering it at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock p. m. his colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], may have the opportunity of offering an amendment as a new section.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not want to object, as I have no real objection to it. But I want to reserve the right to object in order to say that I have been seeking to-day very industriously to get a few moments of time to submit a few remarks on this bill. I am not particularly anxious to make a speech, but I have some data here that has been furnished me that I think would be of some information to the House and that I would like permission to insert in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman voted for the rule. We have not had more than an hour on this bill, and only 10 minutes of that has been occupied by this side of the House since we commenced under the five-minute rule. If the gentleman insists on gagging the minority so that we can have only 10 minutes——

Mr. HAMLIN. The minority had one-half of the time in general debate, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was granted, without any objection, an extension of time——

Mr. MANN. That is the only time that has been used on this side in three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. HAMLIN (continuing). And I have had none. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement furnished to me in regard to the facts covered in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I gave notice that I will object to all extensions, and I will do it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I object to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has that right, mean as it is. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], and the gentleman from Missouri objects to the request of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I move that all debate on section 1 be now closed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to relieve a situation here——

Mr. MANN. If the gentlemen of the majority propose to be indecent to the minority——

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it is perfectly in order for the Chair to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. MANN. It can not be in order until we reach the point in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] wanted to offer his amendment to the bill in its entirety.

Mr. MANN. No; as a new section. That is the courtesy with which we are treated by the majority.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on section 1 be now closed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that pending an amendment that has been offered it is not in order to make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CLARK of Florida: Add to section 1 the following proviso.

"Provided further, That this section shall also include and apply to station agents, train dispatchers, trackmen, office employees, workers in railway shops, and all other employees of a railroad carrier engaged in interstate carriage of passengers and freight."

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that these employees, the train dispatchers, the shopmen, the trackmen, and other men who are engaged in their different work are just as much engaged in the real operation of interstate trains as are the engineers and the conductors, but the language of the bill would limit its application to those actually upon the trains.

Now, if these people who are pressing this bill want to tote fair, if they really want to benefit the laboring people of this country, they will not stop with increasing the salaries of the highest-paid workmen in the railway service. [Applause.] The engineers and the conductors get more pay in proportion to the work done than do the shopmen, the trackmen, the little station agents, and these other people whom I have named in that amendment, and their work is just as necessary for the operation of the trains as is the work of the engineers and the conductors.

I want to say this, gentlemen, that, so far as I am concerned—and I freely say it, because I do not want to take advantage of or mislead anybody—I am opposed to this legislation, but if you intend to legislate, then, for God's sake, legislate fairly and give all these people the advantage of what you propose. [Applause.]

I am in favor of an eight-hour day for all labor, all kinds of labor. But this is not an eight-hour-day proposition. It is simply a proposition to have Congress exert its power to raise the wages of certain classes of people in this country. I question our constitutional right to do it, and I have no doubt whatever as to the fact that we have no moral right to do it. I am in favor of arbitrating all these difficulties.

Arbitration is the only fair method to pursue in order to reach a just and honest conclusion, but that method is refused and we are rushed into the enactment of legislation which we have had no time to consider and deliberate upon.

I want to say this, gentlemen: I feel sadder to-day than at any time during my 12 years' experience here, because I have seen the legislative body of the Nation taken practically by the throat by the representatives of four organizations and made to do what they say, made to do their bidding, and given a limited time in which to do it. It is the work of the highwayman; it is characteristic of the banditti to hold up Congress and say, "If you do not do this, we will do the other. We will plunge this country into chaos, and we will bring misery and untold suffering upon all the millions of people in this land."

I am absolutely opposed to this legislation, because it is wrong. It is undemocratic and in radical opposition to every pronouncement of my party. I am further opposed to its being enacted in this manner. It is the act, as I said before, of the highwayman. The highwayman at the point of a pistol demands your money, and these men with a threat to bring untold misery and suffering upon the Nation demand this legislation. This proceeding is in exact accord with the method of the bandit, and as one Member of this House I will forfeit my seat in it to-day, and I hope I may never occupy it again, before, with my convictions on this subject, I will bow to the command of these arrogant brotherhood leaders and stultify myself by swallowing this kind of stuff. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the 400,000 members of the brotherhoods come no nearer having a strangle hold on my throat than the 1,600,000 who are working on the tracks and elsewhere.

This is an emergency measure. It matters not what anybody's opinion may be as to general legislation when we have an opportunity to legislate for a general eight-hour law. We are trying now, under the doctrine of public safety, to prescribe eight hours a day for those who are connected with the operation of trains. We are committed to that. We have already passed legislation prescribing hours of service for that class of people. We have not time here to open the question for general legislation to accommodate the views of everybody on general questions that are not acute. We are dealing with an acute situation. We are trying to do just those things necessary to relieve that situation and no more. Hereafter, when we have time to legislate about the gentlemen who want eight hours, and who are represented by my distinguished friend from Florida, we can give it consideration. At this time let us confine our legislation to the necessary subjects in hand. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. HULBERT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama rise in support of the amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to oppose it.

Mr. HULBERT. I want to oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who offered this amendment has practically told us that if we vote for his amendment we vote against the bill. I am heartily in favor of this bill. I think that the trainmen of this country have a perfect right to come to the Members of this House and to the Senate and ask for a fair settlement of this matter. My friend Mr. CLARK of Florida was loudly applauded by gentlemen on the other side who are hoping that this strike will not be settled.

Mr. BURNETT. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that those who so loudly applauded will not have the nerve to vote for the amendment if they have to go on record?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is my opinion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] took the President to task this morning for trying to avert this great strike, a strike, gentlemen, that would clog the arteries of commerce and produce paralyzation of trade, and maybe starvation in many sections of the country. I fear that there are gentlemen on that side who do not want this strike controversy settled. Some of you have shown a disposition to play politics at the expense of the country. I think there are gentlemen over there who do not want this strike settled by the President and by the Congress. Gentlemen, do you know that since this strike has been pending the prices of food supplies have risen; potatoes have gone up a dollar a barrel because the dealers fear that the trains will soon stop running? In many places starvation threatens. What are you doing to help us solve this problem? This Democratic President is trying to prevent the strike. What did Mr. Cleveland do? He came forward after the strike was on and helped to break it up. What did Roosevelt do? He waited until the strike had raged five months in the coal mines, and then went and took charge, but demoralization reigned in all the mining regions of the country. What did President Wilson do? He took time by the forelock and is now trying to prevent the greatest strike that ever threatened this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] What are you doing to prevent it, you partisans on that side, who are shaping your creed for your cravings and swallowing your convictions for a job? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

What are you Republicans doing? Some of you are hoping that this strike will come. You Republicans have some millionaires in another body near by who are hoping that the strike will come. Mr. Speaker, it does not take me long to locate a man in this body. I can spot him when I hear him speak five minutes. I know for what interest he speaks and to what crowd he belongs. You can not fool me, and you can not fool the country. I am standing here and pleading in the interest of the American people. I speak for the laboring man who wants justice and for justice to the railroads, and if the railroads need more freight rates, if they can show that they do, I will favor giving it to them. I am not against any legitimate interest in this country. I want to do justice by all of them, and I want the public considered also. It has rights. The laboring man has rights. The railroads have rights, and the American people have rights. Where are you going to stand on this question, gentlemen? This is a critical day. My friend from Florida [Mr. CLARK] speaks of being sad. He says this is a sad day with him. It is a glorious opportunity to me to be able in my humble way as a Representative to help to settle this question and avert this strike, and I am serving my country when I uphold the hands of President Wilson, who delivered that message here the other day, the bravest act since Andrew Jackson defied the national banks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They say he puts his nose into things. Yes; he puts his nose into things, and he settles them, and I make you the prediction that during the next four years he will settle, and settle fairly and justly, all the great industrial disorders in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He has the ability and the courage to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I shall favor this amendment. Is it in order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it in order for two gentlemen to speak on the same side of a question consecutively? The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] opposed the amendment. I am in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to follow the gentleman from New York, if that be satisfactory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all I want, but I submit to the Chair——

Mr. HULBERT. The gentleman does not recognize the fact that I have suffered the opprobrium of sitting on this side, although I belong on the other side. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman means that we have suffered. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is better off for it.

Mr. HULBERT. I came over here in order to sympathize with you.

"The President and Congress are earnestly at work endeavoring to prevent the threatened railroad strike. Passions are rising and there are plenty of critics of every plan proposed. But the great public is concerned solely with the avoidance of the strike and not with fine-spun theories of law. If there had been time to deliberate, it is probable that Congress could have evolved a plan of permanent industrial peace through the suspension of strikes and lockouts pending Federal inquiry. Inasmuch, however, as the only way to avoid the strike is to establish the eight-hour day, the President and Congress are acting in obedience to the popular demand when they enact such legislation.

"If mistakes are made in the laws, they can be corrected at leisure; but a strike, once begun, can not be corrected. Irreparable losses will occur; indeed, damage has already been done to industry in every section of the country. Before this damage intensifies into disaster the menace of a strike must be removed.

"When the money cost of an eight-hour day is compared with the losses that would be caused by a strike, it sinks into insignificance. The highest estimate of the cost of an eight-hours day is $100,000,000 a year; but a strike would paralyze manufacturing industries dependent upon interstate commerce which in 1910 employed 6,500,000 persons, earning $11,000,000 a day. There are 6,000,000 farmers in the United States whose product, worth $3,000,000,000, depends upon the railroads. The perishable fruit crop is worth $140,000,000, and it would be a total loss with the stoppage of trains. The grape crop is worth $25,000,000.

"In 1910 there were 2,217,342 babies in the United States under 1 year of age and 10,631,364 children under 5 years of age. What of them if the milk supply should be even seriously reduced? The infantile-paralysis menace is nothing compared with the slaughter of the innocents that would follow a milk shortage.

"Whether the threatened strike would be successful or not, in the sense of being complete, or whether the railroad managers would be able to break it with accompanying disorder and bloodshed, is not the issue. There must be no test of strength at the expense of the millions of wage earners and farmers, the women and children, and the varied business interests which support the population. Congress must establish the eight-hour day and stop the strike. That danger over, the whole subject of maintaining industrial peace can be considered carefully and legislation framed that will make it impossible for a similar danger to threaten the people of the United States."

This, Mr. Chairman, is an editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of this morning. It appeals to me as the sanest and most logical argument on this momentous question that can be presented—one which I think the majority of us can safely take as our guide. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in his eloquent speech defended the President of the United States. I assume that it is well that the President should have such an able defender on this floor. Too little is heard here about what the President has accomplished during his entire administration. We have not heard anything recently, for instance, about the enormous deficiency in the Treasury. The loss of revenue due to the Underwood tariff law has been completely forgotten in recent days. The gentleman from Alabama talks about the glory of the country, the beauty of American womanhood, and the sturdy character of American manhood, but he fails to account for the $290,000,000 which the President of the United States asked us to raise a few months ago because his economic policy, according to Gov. Colquitt, of Texas, had been "a complete failure."

Why does not the gentleman from Alabama tell us of some of the other things that have been temporarily forgotten in the excitement of the strike?

The gentleman from Alabama has said nothing recently about the nitrate plant, which is to take $15,000,000 from the people of the country to establish an enterprise to increase the 30,000 employees who have been added to the Government pay roll since the Democrats came into power. Why not tell us about the $50,000,000 shipping bill——

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not confining himself to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama has overlooked many interesting facts——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss the amendment. I think perhaps the gentleman's point of order is well taken, but it might also have been taken against the gentleman from Alabama. The gentleman from Ohio can see the mote in the other fellow's eye, but he can not see the mote in the eye of a Democrat.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order. The gentleman from Alabama defended the attitude of the President of the United States upon this bill. He did that, and I am inclined to think the gentleman from Alabama would rather discuss the President's attitude on this strike bill now than to discuss the revenue question, or the armor-plate question, or the nitrate-plant question. I am inclined to think the gentleman from Alabama would rather keep his eyes off the Mexican situation now until after election in November. It might be unpleasant to explain why the National Guard is being kept along the Mexican border. The President's attitude on this strike bill is much more appropriate just now for the purposes of the campaign.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama knows that the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce told this House on July 15 last that he had known for four months that trouble was impending, and that he had investigated and seen the proper parties concerned, and was able to report to this House and the country that there would be no strike. Is it possible the gentleman from Alabama, who was very conspicuous in nominating the President for a second term, did not know what the gentleman from Georgia and the President of the United States knew about this strike situation? Will he not agree that it was a mighty good thing to hold up until before election, when discussion of the revenue question, the nitrate plant, and the armor plate question, and other deficiencies, might be disagreeable?

It has seemed to me that the gentleman has preferred, for good and sufficient reasons—and I hope I am keeping within the rule—to talk strike and talk it volubly for fear the people of the country might want to ask a number of questions before the 7th of November.

I am inclined, Mr. Chairman, to think the amendment of the gentleman from Florida has merit—that if we are going to legislate for one class of employees, voluntarily or under duress, we had better legislate fairly and squarely for all other classes of labor. There ought to be a square deal all down the line. But because this strike question has arisen we should not be expected to forget or obliterate forever the mistakes of the Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the section and pending amendments be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. GARLAND. I shall object to that. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. GARLAND. Five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I want to offer, with some time on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am consistently in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on this amendment is closed.

Mr. GARLAND. I moved to strike out the last two words.

Mr. ADAMSON. My motion contemplated five minutes for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND], and five minutes for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am for the bill as it is presented to us and as it has been amended. I am for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK]. I am consistently for both. I am for the amendment because the claim was given to the President of the United States on behalf of 1,600,000 employees by their representative, Mr. Frazier, who not alone came here in person but who wrote the President, and he, Mr. Frazier, was neglected. He has been ignored entirely, as have the 1,600,000 employees, or a sufficient number to make 80 per cent of the total number employed in the railways, or whatever the number is—80 per cent is enough. These gentlemen, represented by Mr. Frazier, came here and asked that they be given an opportunity to share in whatever legislation was enacted by this Congress, and they asked it for the reason that they deserve it.

They ask it for the further reason that they would proceed to organize and come and make the same demands, and would expect the same treatment at the hands of Congress. We hear the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] rise here and wail about a strike and state that somebody wants a strike. I am consistent in this, that I am for this legislation and for the amendment. I do not want any strike, but I do want this Congress to take care of these poor fellows just as well as we are going to take care of the others, and I am for them all.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. On the average, do not the men who are covered by the Clark amendment get less wages than the 400,000 for whom we are legislating?

Mr. GARLAND. They certainly do; but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] fears that we are going to be pushed into a strike by reason of this amendment. Is that true? Who is going to strike if you put this amendment on this bill? Are the men who are to receive the benefits going to strike? Are the brotherhoods going to strike if you give this to these 1,000,000 other men? Who is to be kept from striking by the legislation that you are going to enact? The brotherhoods. Do they say that they would strike if these other men are given this privilege? Oh, no; not at all; but it seems to be the popular thing for this Democratic President to go along and try to pull off a stunt, and then, when he could not do it, to bring the foundling in here and advise us to pass this legislation for fear of strike.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is for it?

Mr. GARLAND. I am for it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then what are you complaining about? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARLAND. I am complaining because the President did not include the other 80 per cent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I refuse to take up my time in answering the gentleman's questions further. We ought to pass this legislation, and we ought to add this amendment, and we ought to be consistent in our actions here now, because this is just the start. We expect to do more in the future, but we may as well avert two strikes, when we are averting one, rather than to continue on and have more legislation come in here in a week or two. I hope the amendment will be adopted and the bill will be passed. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DENISON) there were—ayes 82, noes 101.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. CLARK of Florida and Mr. ADAMSON to act as tellers.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida does not seem to be present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. GARLAND, will act as teller.

Mr. GARLAND and Mr. ADAMSON took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 120.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statment so that I may not be misunderstood. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FULLER. I have a general pair with him. That is the reason I was not in the Chamber to take my place as teller a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement in order that gentlemen may understand the order of business. Under the rule we have about reached the point where the Chair will have to exercise some discretion in the matter. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] will be recognized to offer an amendment, and will be recognized for five minutes on that amendment, at the end of which time all debate on this section and all amendments thereto will close. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] has an amendment that he desires to offer to this paragraph, but which he does not desire to debate. The Chair thinks the chairman of the committee understands what it is.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; it is merely changing the date.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order. We are wasting time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is undertaking to state what the Chair is going to do. After that is done the Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. STERLING——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute, about which I have given notice that I would like to have read under the same terms.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] immediately after he has recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Page 1, line 12, after the word "engaged" strike out the words "in any capacity" and insert in lieu therefor the words "as conductors, engineers, firemen, and trainmen."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to yield to me for a moment. In order to accommodate my colleague from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] I ask unanimous consent that after the Small amendment has been acted upon the bill be read through entirely in order to reach the place where the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] desires to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that immediately after the action upon this amendment and the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] the bill may be read through before further amendments are offered. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois says he will adopt my first suggestion and offer it following the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia withdraws his request. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the chairman and the gentlemen of the committee. My amendment strikes out the words "in any capacity," in line 12, on page 1, and insert the words "engaged as conductors, firemen, engineers, or trainmen." I would not support any amendment to this bill which impaired its purpose, nor would I offer any amendment which had the same effect. The chairman of the committee says that we are confronting an emergency which makes this bill necessary, and in that I agree. What is the emergency? That the four brotherhoods representing conductors, engineers, firemen, and trainmen make certain demands, which if not granted or otherwise met will result in a strike, and the purpose of this legislation is to avert that strike.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KEATING. I know the gentleman desires to include all members of the brotherhoods.

Mr. SMALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEATING. As a matter of fact the gentleman has not included in his amendment switchmen or hostlers or a lot who are admitted by the brotherhoods and his amendment would not cover the membership of the brotherhoods.

Mr. SMALL. I am using the same language that the brotherhoods used, and if they have an accepted meaning in railway parlance, they will be included. I say that the language used by the brotherhoods is "conductors," "engineers," "firemen," and "trainmen," and I take it that the gentleman from Colorado will not deny that statement.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, yes; I do; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SMALL. That language is used by the brotherhoods, and I repeat it. Now, if we do not want to have any ambiguity in the bill, if we are appointing a commission to investigate the facts and results of this legislation, we wish to use certain phraseology about which there will be no ambiguity, and this language is referred to in describing the four brotherhoods whose action threatens a strike and has made necessary this legislation. Now, the words "in any capacity" will make this bill ambiguous. It may be interpreted to include telegraph operators, if, perchance, as is frequently the case, a part of their duty is to handle messages in the operation of trains. It would include train dispatchers; it might include others, but it does not intend to include——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, there is already a telegraph law.

Mr. SMALL. I understand that. When you use the language "engaged in any capacity" in the operation of trains, why, you must interpret that language according to its ordinary meaning, and "in any capacity" would mean a man or employee who, in any capacity, took part in the operation of trains; and a train dispatcher, a telegraph operator, takes part under this language here. I think that we want to make it clear so that there shall be no misunderstanding. If we strike out those words "in any capacity" and insert in lieu thereof "engaged as conductors, engineers, firemen, and switchmen," we would make it clear.

Now, the gentleman from Colorado says that does not include hostlers and switchmen who are in the brotherhoods.

Mr. TALBOTT. And baggage-masters?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. I say this amendment carries out the purpose, and I submit that we ought to make it certain and definite, and it should be adopted so as not to leave anything indefinite and in an ambiguous form.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in line 9, page 1, to correct the date, where it says "February 1," it should be "February 4, 1887." I make that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, in line 9, by striking out the word "first" and inserting the word "fourth."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STERLING: Page 2, after section 1, add the following as a new section:

"That the act entitled 'An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees,' approved July 15, 1913, be amended by adding thereto as new sections thereof the following:

"'SEC. 12. Whenever a controversy shall arise between an employer or employers and employees subject to this act, which can not be settled through mediation and conciliation in the manner provided in this act, and the Board of Mediation is unable to induce the parties to submit their controversy to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said controversy shall be referred to a board of investigation, which shall consist of 11 members, of which each of the parties to the controversy shall have the right to recommend 4, and these 8, together with 3 other members, one of whom shall act as chairman of the board, shall be appointed by the President of the United States. Upon notice by the President of the appointment of the board of investigation, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation shall arrange a time for the beginning of the investigation and a place where such proceedings may be held. The board of investigation shall organize and make all necessary rules for conducting its hearings. The board shall fully and carefully ascertain all the facts and circumstances, and in its report shall set forth such facts and circumstances, and its findings therefrom, including the cause of the dispute and the board's recommendation for the settlement of the dispute according to the merits and substantial justice of the case. Its recommendation shall deal with each item of the dispute and shall state what in the board's opinion ought or ought not to be done by the respective parties concerned. Wherever it appears to the board expedient so to do, its recommendation shall also state the period during which the proposed settlement should continue in force and the date from which it should commence. The report shall be made to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, who shall cause the same to be published.

"'All testimony before the board of investigation shall be given under oath or affirmation, and any member of the board shall have the power to administer oaths or affirmations. It shall be furnished such assistants as may be necessary in carrying on its work.

"'Each member of the board of investigation shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, together with his traveling and other necessary expenses. So much as may be necessary of the appropriation of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, is hereby made available for the payment of the necessary and proper expenses of boards of investigation. Authority for incurring expenses, including subsistence, by boards of investigation shall first be obtained from the Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

"'SEC. 13. Pending the efforts of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation to induce the employer or employers and employees to submit their controversy to arbitration, and until the investigation of such controversy by the board of investigation provided for in section 12 of this act has been completed and its report thereon published, it shall be unlawful for the employer or employers to declare or cause a lockout, or for the employees, acting in combination, to declare or cause a strike on account of such controversy.

"'SEC. 14. Any railroad company declaring or causing a lockout, or any officer or agent of any railroad company who assists or participates in declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such lockout exists.

"'Any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization who declares or causes a strike contrary to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such strike exists.

"'Any person who incites, encourages, or aids in any manner any employer to declare or continue a lockout, or any person who aids in any manner any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization in declaring or causing a strike contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100.

"'SEC. 15. Any provisions of said act of July 15, 1913, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this amendatory act are hereby repealed.'"

Mr. ADAMSON. I make the point of order on that. It is foreign to every word and syllable in this pending bill and not germane in any respect.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. ADAMSON. I say it is not germane in any respect. It is foreign to every word and syllable and akin to no part of the subject in any respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] makes a point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill now pending before the House is the result of the President's message delivered to Congress a few days ago. The gentleman from Georgia as well as other gentlemen talking in favor of the bill have each stated that it was for the purpose of preventing a strike.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does not the gentleman think that whether it is in order or not it is determined by the contents of the paper and not by extraneous statements or evidence?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the purpose of the bill can be gathered from a report, from statements made by the man in charge of the bill on the floor of the House, as well as by the contents of the bill; and if the court is called upon to construe the law the court can take into consideration as well the report of a committee—though I do not know what the report of this committee is—and the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Now, the gentleman seeks to claim by the point of order that this bill is not for the purpose of preventing a strike; that it has no relation to a strike. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], my colleague, proposes to couple with the existing bill a provision that hereafter before a strike can occur between railroads and their employees the President shall have the power to appoint a commission to make an investigation for the purpose of preventing the strike. This bill is for the purpose of preventing a strike, and the Chair holds that a provision proposed to be attached to it also for the purpose of preventing a strike is not germane to the bill. One of the surprising features to me in this connection is that the President, having made his recommendation to Congress, should now, through his instruments on the floor of the House, insist that the major portion of his recommendations shall not even be allowed to be considered in the House, but that only those portions of his recommendations can be considered which he says we shall consider. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the whole subject matter involved in the recommendations of the President, made for the purpose of preventing the strike, are germane to this bill, which openly and avowedly is for the same purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the title of this bill is "A bill to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes." Of course, no one takes the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] seriously, that any proposition designed to prevent a possible strike upon the part of certain employees of railroads is germane to this bill. The gentleman has in mind a message read to the House by the President of the United States, and if that message were under consideration in the form of legislation this amendment would be in order as germane, but the House is not considering the message of the President, which, under the Constitution, was read to the House for the purpose of giving information on the state of the Union. It is considering a legislative proposition. This bill proposes to establish eight hours as the standard day's labor for certain employees in the operation of trains engaged in interstate commerce, to create a commission to investigate the conditions of the operation of such a law, and to prevent a reduction of compensation after the legislation goes into effect. There is nothing in the bill whatever relative to mediation, nothing in reference to contemplated, proposed, or impending strikes, and, under innumerable decisions which should not be read now to take up the time, now so brief. It is quite clear that the amendment is not in order. The gentleman's speech might have been in order under general debate on this bill. It is ridiculous to assume that he meant his argument seriously on this matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, permit me just a word. If this bill only consisted of the first section providing for an increase of wages perhaps the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois would not be in order. I ask the attention of the Chair to the provision carried in section 2, which provides for an investigation made by a commission of three of certain facts pertaining to industrial disputes on interstate carriers. That is a distinct, substantive proposition providing for a commission to investigate certain conditions now prevailing upon the railroads of this country. The gentleman's proposal is nothing more than an investigation of conditions that may occur in the future on these same interstate carrier railroads and is but perpetuating and making permanent what is in a way provided for temporarily in section 2.

This bill provides for something more than one object. It is something more than a bill to increase the rate of wages. It is a bill to authorize the appointment of a commission to ascertain facts. The purport of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is likewise an authorization for the appointment of a commission to investigate facts, not as to this industrial dispute existing to-day, but in the future.

We have a bill before us that is not limited to one single object, namely, that of increasing the rate of wages of certain interstate railway employees, but also providing for the creation of a commission. By providing for that second matter I submit it is worthy at least of consideration that where a bill authorizes a commission to investigate something now existing another amendment providing for a permanent body to investigate those same conditions is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule. The Chair would wish that there might be some further time for an argument upon this matter and examination of the precedents, because the Chair is inclined to state that he is not entirely clear in his own mind. But it does appear to the Chair, from such examination as he has been able to give to the amendment that is proposed, and from such hurried examination of the precedents as he has been able to make, that the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is not germane to any part of this particular bill which is before the House, and therefore, on the ground that it is not germane, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. As many as favor the decision of the Chair as the judgment of the committee will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] One hundred and nine gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Ninety-two gentlemen have risen in the negative. Upon this vote the ayes are 109 and the noes are 92, and the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a correction in one place. On page 3, line 2, after the word "rent," insert the words "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere." Otherwise the commission could not rent quarters. I ask unanimous consent to insert that on page 3, line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 3, line 2, after the word "rent," by inserting the words "in the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has that section been read?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has not been. I asked unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. It is now half post 4 o'clock. The committee has no power.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not at the time the gentleman made his request.

Mr. MANN. I will not dispute as to that with the Chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, under the rule, the committee rises.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee rises automatically to report to the House.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an 8-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, had directed him to report it back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. None.

The SPEAKER. If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] to make a motion with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, that was the same motion that was read as an amendment in the Committee of the Whole. Will it be possible to get consent to dispense with the second reading of it here?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it will hurt that side to have it read the second time. It is in conformity with the President's recommendation.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STERLING moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with directions to that committee to report the bill back forthwith, with the following amendment:

Add to the bill as a new section the following:

"SEC. —. That the act entitled 'An act providing for mediation, conciliation, and arbitration in controversies between certain employers and their employees,' approved July 15, 1913, be amended by adding thereto as new sections thereof the following:

"'SEC. 12. Whenever a controversy shall arise between an employer or employers and employees subject to this act which can not be settled through mediation and conciliation in the manner provided in this act, and the Board of Mediation is unable to induce the parties to submit their controversy to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said controversy shall be referred to a board of investigation, which shall consist of 11 members, of which each of the parties to the controversy shall have the right to recommend 4, and these 8, together with 3 other members, one of whom shall act as chairman of the board, shall be appointed by the President of the United States. Upon notice by the President of the appointment of the board of investigation, the Board of Mediation and Conciliation shall arrange a time for the beginning of the investigation and a place where such proceedings may be held. The board of investigation shall organize and make all necessary rules for conducting its hearings. The board shall fully and carefully ascertain all the facts and circumstances, and in its report shall set forth such facts and circumstances, and its findings therefrom, including the cause of the dispute and the board's recommendation for the settlement of the dispute according to the merits and substantial justice of the case. Its recommendation shall deal with each item of the dispute and shall state what in the board's opinion ought or ought not to be done by the respective parties concerned. Wherever it appears to the board expedient so to do, its recommendation shall also state the period during which the proposed settlement should continue in force and the date from which it should commence. The report shall be made to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, who shall cause the same to be published.

"'All testimony before the board of investigation shall be given under oath or affirmation, and any member of the board shall have the power to administer oaths or affirmations. It shall be furnished such assistants as may be necessary in carrying on its work.

"'Each member of the board of investigation shall receive such compensation as may be fixed by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation, together with his traveling and other necessary expenses. So much as may be necessary of the appropriation of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, is hereby made available for the payment of the necessary and proper expenses of boards of investigation. Authority for incurring expenses, including subsistence, by boards of investigation shall first be obtained from the board of mediation and conciliation.

"'SEC. 13. Pending the efforts of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation to induce the employer or employers and employees to submit their controversy to arbitration, and until the investigation of such controversy by the board of investigation provided for in section 12 of this act has been completed and its report thereon published, it shall be unlawful for the employer or employers to declare or cause a lockout, or for the employees, acting in combination, to declare or cause a strike on account of such controversy.

"'SEC. 14. Any railroad company declaring or causing a lockout, or any officer or agent of any railroad company who assists or participates in declaring or causing a lockout contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such lockout exists.

"'Any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization who declares or causes a strike contrary to the provisions of this act shall be liable to a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000 for each day or part of a day that such strike exists.

"'Any person who incites, encourages, or aids in any manner any employer to declare or continue a lockout, or any person who aids in any manner any officer, agent, or employee of any organized body of labor or labor organization in declaring or causing a strike contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100.

"'SEC. 15. Any provisions of said act of July 15, 1913, which are inconsistent with the provisions of this amendatory act are hereby repealed.'"

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this motion to recommit is not in order, because it was not in order as an amendment to the bill and is not germane in any respect.

This bill seeks to establish, first, an eight-hour workday; second, a commission to investigate the operation of that eight-hour workday; third, to hold the present status until the report is made; and, fourth, it fixes a penalty for violation. There is not a word in it about strikes or arbitration, nothing akin to it, in any syllable or sentence or word or letter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think if my friend from Georgia had pursued his discourse a few sentences further he would have said this bill is not for the purpose of affecting the question of a strike; that it is not to prevent a strike; that it has nothing to do with a strike. He went nearly that far. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, we were told about the time you came into the occupancy of that chair which you occupy so well that the rules of the House had been made more liberal, so that the House would have a chance to consider propositions. The other day the President came before the House and in a message made six recommendations, numbered, "for the purpose of preventing a strike." That is what the President said. One of those recommendations was in regard to the establishment of eight hours as a basis for compensation. That is covered in this bill. One of the recommendations was for the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe by experience certain things. That is covered or intended to be covered by one of the provisions of this bill. There were six of these recommendations, all relating to the same subject matter—the prevention of strikes. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has reported a bill covering two of these recommendations. They are all connected. They are all allied. They were all made by the President at the same time, for the same purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. As a great parliamentary authority, as I know the gentleman is, does he think the Chair ought to decide whether this motion is germane to the bill by aliunde statements and facts, or should the Chair decide it by the contents of the papers themselves?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that the Chair in reading this bill should forget all he knows. That is what the gentleman from Georgia undertakes to do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have to do it to hold it in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. He could easily forget all that the gentleman from New York knows without losing much information. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. Gentlemen will take their seats. If nobody else cares to hear this argument on the point of order, the Chair wants to hear it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia says I have some little knowledge of parliamentary law. I do not profess to have a great deal. In my honest judgment, this proposition is in order in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose this amendment had been offered in the form of a House bill. To what committee would the Chair have referred it?

Mr. MANN. To the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is no other place where it could be referred.

Mr. ADAMSON. He has been sending it to the Committee on the Judiciary for six years.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from Georgia has a memory so short that he can not remember overnight.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. MANN. The Newlands Act was reported from the gentleman's committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It went to the Committee on the Judiciary over my protest. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. All of these bills, both here and in the Senate, go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Here we call it the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. All of these bills here and in the Senate go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. All of the President's propositions are related to the same subject matter. Do we propose to have a ruling that the House, in considering this great question to prevent a strike, is throttled by the rule, so that we have no power to adopt methods which may ward off a strike in the future? Are we and our rules so futile that we can not even consider a proposition which may stop strikes in the future? Why, Mr. Speaker, the Newlands Act, which passed this House, contained all sorts of propositions of this kind. I have no doubt if the gentleman from Georgia had had his way he would have declared that an amendment providing for arbitration would not be in order in a bill providing for mediation and conciliation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to the gentleman, hoping to get information.

Mr. ADAMSON. We have been doing some things, but not all things, and in the language of the dying saint, I want to assure the gentleman that "we hope to meet again," in Congress, to finish the work.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, in the language of somebody better than the dying saint, "now is the accepted time." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I contend that we have the right on this bill to present these propositions, all of which are germane to one another. The bill now pending contains two of them, not related. Section 1 of the bill does not at all depend upon section 2. All six of the President's recommendations were related. All related to the prevention of strikes. I contend that the Speaker of this House, having the knowledge that he has, should hold that this is a bill intended to prevent a strike, and that a provision which will prevent a strike in the future, a year from now, is just as germane as one intended to prevent a strike next Monday. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] confesses that he does not know much about parliamentary law, he means that he confesses that he has not a very good argument to present in support of his proposition. The Democratic Party, when it promised to liberalize the rules of the House, did not promise that there should be chaos in the transaction of the business of the House. It did not propose that all legislation that might properly be referred to a particular committee should be in order in a single bill if offered as amendments to it. The rule of germaneness has been established since the organization of the House of Representatives. It was not a rule in the House of Commons. The rule in the House of Commons was that any amendment could be offered to a bill, and the purpose of offering amendments that were not germane was to change so completely the character of a bill as to make those who favored it vote against it after the alterations. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to change the character of this bill, so that those who are anxious to meet the present emergency would be compelled, because of the doubtful constitutionality of the proposition, to vote against the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Under the rules of the House amendments must be germane. They must be germane for well-defined and specific reasons. The House is entitled to have some information, or to be able to draw some inferences as to the character of the amendments that are to be considered. That is in the interest of orderly procedure, and to prevent the consideration of undigested legislation in haste. The mere fact that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] is the chairman of a committee that has jurisdiction over the construction of bridges across navigable streams does not make a bridge bill germane to this particular bill. This bill provides a standard workday of eight hours for certain employees in the operation of trains engaged in interstate commerce. It provides for the appointment of a commission to investigate and report upon the effect of such a standard workday. It provides that during the continuance of the commission there shall be no change in the compensation paid for the standard workday of eight hours from that now paid for the prevailing standard day on the roads, and it makes any violation of the provisions of the proposed law a crime. Any provision is germane to this bill, and in order, that could naturally and reasonably and logically be expected to follow or to be applied to any of its provisions. Any modification of the hours of the proposed standard workday, any change in the complexion of the commission or of its duties, any enlargement or diminution of the offenses created, any change in the conditions affecting the compensation during the existence of the commission—any such proposition would undoubtedly be germane.

But the gentleman proposes, not something that reasonably and naturally and logically follows the provisions in the bill, but he proposes to amend an existing law on a subject apart from, and unrelated to, anything contained in the bill.

The gentleman from Illinois is attempting to confuse the House and to mislead the Speaker by urging that the President's recommendations are to be considered as the basis as to whether proposed amendments to the bill are germane.

Mr. Speaker, the President reads an annual message to Congress, and it usually is referred to a number of different committees. If such a message had references in it to the revenue and a revenue bill were introduced from the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Illinois would not seriously contend that some other subject matter referred to by the President would be in order as a germane amendment to such a revenue bill. Nor could it be considered that, if the President in urging a revision of the tariff laws urged the creation of a tariff commission, such a provision would be in order in a bill revising the tariff law, although the Committee on Ways and Means has jurisdiction of both subjects. It could not be urged successfully, because distinguished Republican Speakers have held to the contrary when such questions arose in the House.

So, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois is not serious in urging this amendment as germane. He is attempting to mislead the country into the belief that the Democratic Party is not in earnest in its attempt to meet the present existing emergency. Everyone knows that a comprehensive program of legislation could not be enacted in time to prevent the contemplated strike of certain railroad employees. Certain legislation embodied in this bill if enacted into law, or if the Congress acts in such a way as to show that there is a reasonable probability that within a brief time it will be enacted into law, will avert the strike. [Applause.] In the interest of the body politic, in the interest of the people of the United States, regardless of how certain elements in the community may or may not be affected in an effort to avert a great calamity that threatens our country, the Democratic Party comes forward in the emergency with the one practical proposition that will prevent the impending calamity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We had hoped, but we ought not to have expected, the patriotic support of our political opponents in this House in this crisis. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Their conduct shows that they are not attempting to help. They are attempting to hinder, so that it is necessary for us, under the rules adopted by the House, under the long established precedents dating from the organization of the Government, to go forward in this matter without their help and despite their futile opposition. [Cries of "Rule!" "Rule!"]

The SPEAKER. It does not hasten matters to be crying for a vote. The Chair wants to hear a sufficient number of gentlemen to get all of the information he can. He does not assume to know everything.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to point out to the Chair, reading from page 13363 of the RECORD, that the whole of the special message of the President on this subject of strike and the remedy for it was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that his suggestion was that all of these recommendations—and the fifth is the same proposed in the motion to recommit—should be embodied in an amendment to one bill, that of the interstate-commerce bill, enlarging the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The committee received the message and this bill has been reported. It is not true that that bill refers only to labor and a labor day. The gentleman who has taken this point of order has not noticed page 2 of the bill, at lines 13 and 14, in which the commission that has been made is not only to look into the operation and effect of the institution of the eight-hour day—standard workday—as above defined, but also general labor conditions. The words are, "and the facts and conditions affecting the relations between such common carriers and employees."

The bill therefore orders a report on the facts and conditions which affect the relations of the employers and employees. This motion to recommit instead of waiting for such report says let us pass a measure which affects these relations so as to deal with the matter now instead of hereafter. By the bill all these matters contained in the President's message are to be referred to a commission. We insist that that makes it perfectly in order to say that, instead of referring them to a commission, we will legislate now upon one of those matters which otherwise goes to the commission.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests that the President made six recommendations in his message. That is true. Of course, the Chair, like everyone else, has a great deal of respect for recommendations made by the President of the United States, but the Chair is surely not expected to rule on the six propositions laid down by the President in that message. It might take six bills, or it might take four, or it might take three. In the bill before the House there are two of the recommendations that the President made, and both of them affect the question of wages, and do not affect anything else. Critically considered, the Speaker might have cut that message up and referred various parts of it to various committees, but he did not choose to do that. It was a hurried proceeding all around.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very correctly suggests that the Speaker does not have to forget all he knows in order to rule upon a point of order, and what the Chair does know is that those six propositions laid down by the President embodied two principal features, one of which was to prevent a strike from taking place on all of the railroads of the United States at 7 o'clock next Monday morning, and the other looking to a general system of preventing strikes in days to come. The one that we are working on now is to prevent a strike at 7 o'clock next Monday morning. All of the propositions laid down in the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] may be of the highest merit. The Chair is not passing upon that; he does not have to pass upon it. This bill contains four sections. One of them establishes an eight-hour law. The second section is to appoint a commission of observation—and that is exactly what it is—which is to make its report at a certain time. The third is that, pending the report of this commission and for a period of 30 days thereafter, the compensation of the railway employees subject to the act shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and that for all necessary time in excess of eight hours such employees shall be paid at a rate not less than the pro rata rate for such standard eight-hour workday. Section 4 prescribes penalties for violating the provisions of the bill.

The Chair does not think that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] is germane, and, therefore, sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the partisan decision of the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from New York moves to lay that appeal on the table. The Chair feels some delicacy about counting in his own case, and without objection the Chair will take this vote by tellers.

Mr. MANN. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to table the appeal from the decision of the Chair made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 204, nays 87, answered "present" 9, not voting 132, as follows:

YEAS—204.

So the motion to table the appeal from the decision of the Chair was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado with Mr. SNYDER.

Mr. OGLESBY with Mr. MADDEN.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts.

Mr. HELM with Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. BEAKES with Mr. HOWELL.

Mr. PARK with Mr. HAMILTON of New York.

Mr. STOUT with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. GRAY of Alabama with Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan.

Mr. SAUNDERS with Mr. MILLER of Minnesota.

Mr. MCDERMOTT with Mr. CHARLES.

Mr. WILSON of Florida with Mr. SNELL.

Mr. HUGHES with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HART with Mr. ELSTON.

Mr. LAZARO with Mr. JAMES.

Mr. BLACKMON with Mr. CAPSTICK.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. LOFT with Mr. WARD.

Mr. MCKELLAR with Mr. AUSTIN.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. ADAIR with Mr. MOORES of Indiana.

Mr. CLARK of Florida with Mr. FULLER.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. BELL with Mr. MAPES.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas with Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. LEVER with Mr. HAWLEY (and on matters of local interest).

Mr. CANTRILL with Mr. LANGLEY.

Mr. CRISP with Mr. HINDS.

Mr. GREGG with Mr. STEENERSON.

Mr. MCGILLICUDDY with Mr. GUERNSEY.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska with Mr. SLOAN.

Mr. LEE with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. GRAHAM.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana with Mr. TILSON.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. SWEET.

Mr. PRICE with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. BURGESS with Mr. DRUKKER.

Mr. FLOOD with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. DECKER with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. HAY with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN.

Mr. KETTNER with Mr. SCOTT of Michigan.

Mr. DILL with Mr. MCFADDEN.

Mr. CHURCH with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. GARNER with Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma with Mr. HUTCHINSON.

Mr. SHOUSE with Mr. LOUD.

Mr. SUMNERS with Mr. MAGEE.

For the balance of the session:

Mr. WALKER with Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS.

Mr. FERRIS with Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. CALLAWAY with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. BURKE with Mr. WASON.

Mr. FOSTER with Mr. CHIPERFIELD.

Mr. PATTEN with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. PATTEN. Mr. Speaker, I was here on the roll call and voted "aye." I am paired with Mr. FAIRCHILD, of New York, and I desire to withdraw that vote and to be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. PATTEN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHIPERFIELD, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. FOSTER was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired on the final vote with Mr. ADAIR, not on the preliminary vote, and I desire my vote to stand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to announce again that the Chair has nothing on earth to do with pairs. If he could do it, he would abolish them. [Applause.] This is an outside performance.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. So the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The other motion being held out of order, this is the first motion made.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. On what?

Mr. ADAMSON. On the gentleman's motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Here is the situation about that: The other motion to recommit was ruled out of order, and being null and void, the gentleman from New Jersey has a right to make a motion to recommit.

Mr. ADAMSON. I recognize that and withdraw my point and move the previous question on the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 181.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Evidently a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 239, nays 56, answered "present" 5, not voting 132, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. ADAIR (for the bill) with Mr. MOORES of Indiana (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. GREGG with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. AIKEN with Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. SMITH of Texas with Mr. CRAGO.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea" on this bill, and I desire to withdraw by vote and answer "present." I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CAPSTICK, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so merely that the gentleman from North Carolina may make some statement to the House as to what is likely to be before it to-morrow outside of the Webb export bill and the situation as to the revenue bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, the revenue bill, of course, will not be before the House, but the Webb bill will, and we are expecting that this bill which has just been passed will come back from the Senate in some form or other, and therefore it will be necessary for every man to be here to-morrow and not leave the city.

Mr. MANN. As to the revenue bill, has the gentleman any information as to when that is likely to be here?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is likely to be here Tuesday.

Mr. MANN. I take it that when it comes the gentleman will ask to send it to conference?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will; yes. I will ask unanimous consent to send it to conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1528. An act for the relief of Martin Huhn.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 13391. An act to amend certain sections of the act entitled "Federal reserve act," approved December 23, 1913.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6667. An act to incorporate the American Nurses' Association; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 2, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 2, 1916.

(Legislative day of Friday, September 1, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PROPOSED RAILROAD LEGISLATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 17700) to establish an eight-hour day for employees of carriers engaged in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bryan	Kenyon	Oliver	Sheppard
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Overman	Sherman
Culberson	Lane	Owen	Simmons
Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Penrose	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	McCumber	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Gronna	Martin, Va.	Reed	Smoot
Hardwick	Myers	Robinson	Sterling
Husting	Nelson	Ransdell	Taggart
Jones	Newlands	Shafroth	Wadsworth

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KERN. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is unavoidably detained this morning. I desire to make an additional statement. Yesterday evening the Senator from Mississippi was called to the station on account of his family going away, and I promised to make the announcement when the roll was called. I neglected to do it. I desire to say now that he was unavoidably detained for that reason on the first roll call at the evening session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty-six Senators have responded to the call, and the Chair will direct the Secretary to call the roll the second time.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. COLT, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. BRADY, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. VARDAMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHAFROTH obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am offering an amendment myself.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say just a few words in relation to this proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Colorado permit the Chair to make a statement before he proceeds?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Last evening, before the unanimous consent was entered into pursuant to a practice here for a long time, certain Senators notified the Chair that they desired to address the Senate, and the Chair made a note of the names in the order in which the applications were made. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] made the first application, and his name appears first on the list, and also the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. The Chair thought it proper to say that unless the Senate should indicate a different opinion he would divide the period of 30 minutes until 12 o'clock between the four names mentioned—that is to say, the Chair recognizes first the Senator from Colorado, in accordance with his request, next the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], then the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and then the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], if that arrangement will be satisfactory.

The 15-minute period has not yet been disposed of, and the Chair will not undertake to do that, hoping that the representatives on either side of the Chamber will make a division of that time.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the 15-minute period began at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The 30-minute period.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that it was changed. The first unanimous-consent agreement presented was that beginning with 10 o'clock there should be no speech longer than 30 minutes, but it was finally decided——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement is recorded, and it is correct.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is 30 minutes during the first 2 hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thirty minutes the first two hours.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is included among those mentioned by the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is. The order will be, unless the Senate changes it or express a desire to change it, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] for 30 minutes, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] 30 minutes, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] 30 minutes, and the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] 30 minutes. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a personal matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was an inadvertence beyond a doubt on the part of the Chair, but the rule is very explicit that a unanimous-consent agreement can not be entered into until after the roll has been called. Last evening the Chair declared the unanimous-consent agreement agreed to before the roll was called. Of course, the calling of the roll would be an empty formality if the agreement had been entered into before that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from New Hampshire will read the last paragraph, page 15849 of the RECORD, he will find that the Chair made this statement. It is a fact that no Senators came in and the roll call disclosed that they were present at the time the unanimous consent was agreed to after a long negotiation. No additional attendance was shown by the roll call and the Chair made this announcement:

> The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The unanimous-consent agreement will stand, a quorum being disclosed.

That was rather an informal way of doing it, but it drew the matter to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the roll was called after that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to state to the Chair that my recollection of the rule is that a proposed unanimous-consent agreement can not even be submitted to the Senate for approval until after the roll has been called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The common sense of it is that it is the judgment of the Senators who are present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Under the unanimous-consent agreement we were to commence arguments at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The House amended the employers' compensation act——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement no business of that kind can be entertained. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent for the appointment of a conference committee on the part of the Senate upon the workmen's compensation act. The Senator from Colorado yields it out of his time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I shall not occupy three minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is very important that we should get together to-day in conference. The House amended our bill, and I think we can modify a little the House amendment and save a great deal of trouble in the operation of the act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Georgia is out of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are working under a unanimous consent at this time. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, in the discussion of the bill on yesterday various Senators construed section 6 of the Senate bill, or the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the House bill, as being in the nature of a compulsory arbitration provision. They contended that the language used in that section was of a mandatory nature and provided no exception, and while it did not provide for penalties for a violation of it, notwithstanding some thought that it might be enforced, perhaps, by some order or by an injunctive process.

The Senator from Alabama contended that it was not a compulsory provision, that it did not bind labor to accept the wage and to work, that it was an advisory matter, that it was intended for the purpose of creating a public sentiment in favor of a just rate, and for that reason he contended that it was not a compulsory arbitration provision, but would have a great influence in determining a fair wage.

Inasmuch as the Senators who are questioning the amendment of the Senator from Alabama agree that it was not intended as a provision of a compulsory nature, it seems to me that just a few words expressing that in direct terms should be added to the amendment, so that there could be no misunderstanding with relation to it.

Mr. President, the language of section 6, it seems to me, is very imperative. It reads as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power to fix the hours of labor and prescribe just and reasonable wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act. The rate of wages and the hours of labor provided for in this act shall remain fixed for service and pay until changed by the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, within a period of not less than 6 nor more than 12 months from the passage of this act, shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what shall be the hours of labor for all employees of the railroads above mentioned.

The Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power from time to time to change the hours of labor and the rate of wages for all employees of the railroads named in section 1 of this act, either in whole or in part, prescribed by it on its own initiative, on the petition of the employees, the managers of the railroads, or the public.

It does seem to me that that language is very imperative. Yet the Senator from Alabama contended that it was not compulsory; that there was no provision there of that nature.

So, Mr. President, in order to remove any doubt upon that subject, I want to offer an amendment to be added to the amendment presented by the Senator from Alabama, which reads as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling the employees to work at the wages prescribed.

That, it seems to me, carries out the view of the Senator from Alabama and the Senators who interrogated him on yesterday, and consequently its adoption would clear very materially section 6 of the Senate bill or the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PITTMAN. Taking the time of the Senator from Colorado, I think there is a wrong impression on the part of the Senator from Colorado in regard to the position taken by the Senator from Nevada yesterday in a colloquy with the Senator from Alabama. I never admitted that it was the intention of section 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not quite understand for what purpose the Senator from Nevada rose, whether for the purpose of an explanation or a correction of the record or what.

Mr. PITTMAN. It was to correct a misstatement of my position by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are working under a unanimous consent agreement, and the time is parceled out until 12 o'clock.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was not trying to take the floor from any Senator, but I did not see the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] who I understand is next to take the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado desire to address the Senate further?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not, except to say that there were several Senators who interrogated the Senator from Alabama, and the general drift was that way. So I have presented this amendment in order to remove any doubt concerning it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling the employees to work at the wages prescribed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has 15 minutes of his time left, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] will be recognized for that 15 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, are we to have the time farmed out to Senators?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The four Senators the Chair has named have preempted the time up to the period when the 15-minute rule operates. As to the distribution of the 15-minute periods, the Chair hopes the representatives of the two sides of the Chamber will make a division of the time. Otherwise the Chair must recognize the Senators in the order in which they make application. The matter ought to be arranged by an adjustment, and it can be done in a very few minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I myself think that ought to be agreed to, but I do not believe that the time ought to be farmed out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time is not being farmed out any further than that the Senator from Colorado on last evening indicated to the Chair that he desired to address the Senate and asked that his name be entered on the list, which is in accordance with the custom which has prevailed here immemorially. Now the Senator from Colorado says he does not desire to occupy the entire 30 minutes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the next Senator on the list ought to be recognized and be given 30 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado did not desire to occupy 30 minutes, so the Chair thought, under the circumstances, it would not be inequitable to recognize the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry merely for my own information. Will the Chair be kind enough to state whether, as to the disposition of the 15 minutes allowed to each Senator after 12 o'clock, the order will prevail that Senators will have to send their names to the desk in order to be recognized?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not so stated. The Chair hopes that the representatives of the two sides of the Chamber will adjust that matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply desired to express the hope that the Chair will not take the names of Senators without the knowledge of other Senators and recognize them accordingly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not going to do that for the present. When the hour of 12 o'clock has arrived, he must do something, and he will recognize the first Senator who rises.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If Senators be recognized in that order by the Chair that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I had no intention of interfering with the order established by the Chair, and in which, I think, the Senate has concurred, but not seeing the Senator present who desired to follow the Senator from Colorado I simply took this opportunity of correcting a false impression which the Senator from Colorado evidently had.

On yesterday the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was contending that this bill was formed by the committee largely in accord with the wishes of the President of the United States. He stated that this bill was even more moderate than that desired by the President of the United States, in that the President desired a bill providing for compulsory arbitration. On that statement the Senator from Nevada took issue with the Senator from Alabama, and in support of his contention the Senator from Nevada read from the message of the President of the United States to show that, while the President favored an investigation of this question, nowhere through all of his messages had he ever indicated a desire for compusory arbitration. The President did express in his message a belief in the principle of arbitration, but not in the principle of compulsory arbitration. He did favor making the arbitration effective and binding on both sides by making it a court judgment, but he did not favor the compelling of arbitration by either side.

All of us favor arbitration; we all should like to see opposing sides get together and submit their differences to arbitration, and we want to see them bound by the judgment of that arbitration; but nowhere, I repeat, has the President of the United States indicated a belief in compulsory arbitration.

The Senator from Alabama then stated that he was not referring to the President's message; that he was referring to the bills that were submitted by a Deputy Attorney General to the committee on behalf of the President as a sample of the character of legislation desired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

I have had an opportunity to examine those bills, and I find that there is nothing in any one of them as submitted by the Deputy Attorney General to the committee that anywhere indicates a desire or intention for compulsory arbitration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Nevada recognize the fact that compulsory arbitration compelling the employees to work is absolutely impracticable?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Unquestionably, whenever a person is employed he can render his services inefficient, and thereby make them of no value whatever. Therefore he has always the upper hand in a contest of that kind. For that reason I do not believe that any compulsory arbitration law could ever be made effective. However, does not the Senator from Nevada think that the amendment which I have proposed throws a light upon, or at least makes clear, the intent and purpose of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which includes the bills submitted by the Deputy Attorney General to the committee as a matter for consideration. I ask unanimous consent that, without reading, there be included in my remarks the bill found on page 1, known as the "Senate committee print No. 1."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Tentative committee print No. 1.]

IN THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

A bill to establish the eight-hour standard workday in interstate transportation and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Beginning January 1, 1917, eight hours, in contracts for labor, shall be deemed a day's work and the measure or standard for the purpose of reckoning the compensation of all persons who are now or may hereafter be employed by any common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, and who are now or may hereafter be actually engaged in the operation of trains used for the transportation of persons or property on railroads, from any State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia, or from one place in a Territory to another place in the same Territory, or from any place in the United States to an adjacent foreign country, or from any place in the United States through a foreign country to any other place in the United States.

SEC. 2. The President shall appoint a commission of three to be known as the eight-hour day commission, which shall observe the administrative and financial effects of the institution of the eight-hour standard workday as above defined during a period of not less than six nor more than eight months, in the discretion of the commission, and within 30 days thereafter shall report its findings to the President and to Congress.

The President shall transmit the report of the eight-hour day commission to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which shall consider an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads affected as may have been rendered necessary by the adoption of the eight-hour day and which have not been offset by administrative readjustment and economies, should the facts disclosed justify the increase.

SEC. 3. Pending the report of the eight-hour day commission and the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as above provided, and for a period of —— days thereafter, the compensation of railway employees subject to this act for a standard eight-hour workday shall not be reduced below the present standard day's wage, and for all services in excess of eight hours such employees shall receive not less than the pro rata proportion of the compensation received for the standard eight-hour workday.

Any carrier violating this provision shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $100 and not exceeding $1,000 in respect to each employee whose compensation is affected by such violation, which penalty shall accrue to the United States, and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

SEC. 4. The eight-hour day commission shall organize and select its own chairman and make all necessary rules for conducting its work. It shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such employees, to rent such offices, and to purchase such books, stationery, and other supplies as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which the commission was created. It shall, whenever practicable, be supplied with suitable quarters in any Federal building located at its place of meeting or at any place where the commission may adjourn for its deliberations.

The commission is authorized, as a whole or by subcommittees duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States; and all testimony before the commission shall be on oath or affirmation. Witnesses shall be paid the same witness fees and mileage as witnesses in courts of the United States.

For the purposes of this act the eight-hour day commission, or any member thereof, shall have power to administer oaths, sign subpœnas, require the attendance and testimony of witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents as may be material to a just determination of the matters under investigation by it; and may invoke the aid of the United States courts to compel witnesses to attend and testify and to produce such books, papers, contracts, agreements, and documents to the same extent and under the same conditions and penalties as is provided for in the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, and the amendments thereto. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, and if the commission shall be divided in opinion, the findings of the majority upon any point shall be deemed the findings of the commission.

SEC. 5. The members of the eight-hour day commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses, and in addition a compensation of —— per diem, payable monthly, while actually engaged in the work of the commission and while going to and returning from such work. The sum of ——, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be immediately available on the requisition of the President and to continue available until the commission shall have completed its work, for the payment of the necessary and proper expenses incurred as hereinbefore authorized, including per diem of the commissioners, witness fees and mileage, rent, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books, salaries of employees, and traveling and other necessary expenses of members or employees of the eight-hour day commission, to be approved by the chairman of said commission and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

Mr. PITTMAN. By an examination of that bill, it will be found that it did not contain section 6 of the Senate bill, which provides for the fixing of these rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It will also be found that the bills submitted by the Deputy Attorney General did not contain this provision now found in the Senate bill:

Any person who shall willfully delay, obstruct, or hinder the operation of trains mentioned in section 1 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 and imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

It will be found, upon examination of that bill, that there is no indication of compulsory arbitration. Consequently the Senator from Alabama had yesterday nothing upon which to base his assertion that the President favored compulsory arbitration.

As the Senator from Colorado says, however, compulsory arbitration is not only absurd, but, in my opinion, it is such an apparent violation of the Constitution that no one for a moment would attempt to consider it in that relation.

The objection that I have to the Senator's [Mr. SHAFROTH] amendment is that, in my opinion, it means nothing. The amendment states that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have power to fix wages and to establish the hours of labor, but that it shall not compel a man to work; in other words, it shall not compel a man to be a railroad employee. Well, there is nothing on God's earth that could compel a man to be a railroad employee. The amendment is absolutely meaningless. What we should say is that a man may be a railroad employee without having to submit to the determination of the question of wage and hours by this particular body. The Senator's amendment to the amendment does not cure that at all.

So far as the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is concerned, it involves a question which should be discussed at great length. The distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is on the Interstate Commerce Committee, entirely disagrees with the Senator from Alabama. He stated that it would be impracticable. He objects to that particular body attempting to fix the wage. When there is such a difference of opinion amongst great lawyers of this body who have for years given this matter study, I say it is not right for us to attempt to decide that question now; but there is one question that we ought to be prepared to decide now, and that is the proposition which was made by the President to the contending forces—the proposition which is involved in the House bill. That proposition we are ready to decide.

If we are ready to decide that question, why involve it with a hundred other questions which we do not understand and which we are not ready to decide? We can take up those questions in December. At the present time we have before us in concrete form a proposal made by the President of the United States to the opposing forces, which one of them accepted and which the other refused. By reason of the refusal of one of those parties this action of Congress has become necessary. We are here now simply to enforce the proposition that one side accepted and which the other side did not accept, without committing Congress or any Member of this body on any other question involved in this great controversy. It was for such reasons that upon the report of the House bill to the Senate last evening I asked unanimous consent that it displace the Senate bill. The House bill should pass without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five minutes of the first 30-minute period are left.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not care to make any extended observations about this bill, and yet there are some things to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate and the country at this time. At the beginning of this debate, almost immediately following the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I undertook to make some observations relative to this question and to this situation. On Wednesday of this week I laid down the proposition that, in my judgment, the correct way to handle this situation was to permanently refer all questions relating to wages and hours, the terms and conditions of railroad employment to the Interstate Commerce Commission, for regulation by that body, insisting then, as I insist now, that the Interstate Commerce Commission is fully equipped for that work; that constitutionally the question is not in any way different from the question of delegating to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to establish just and reasonable freight and passenger rates. In the course of my remarks on that occasion the Senator from Iowa said that the questions were radically different; that while it was possible to set up a just and reasonable standard for rates it was utterly impossible to set up a just and reasonable standard for wages.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator does not care to be interrupted, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me to finish this observation, I will yield to him in just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Georgia resumes, let the Chair make an announcement. As Senators are talking against a time limit, the Chair will not undertake to intervene and break in on the momentum of a Senator who has a given time for the delivery of his speech, because the Chair realizes that to do so would interfere with the entertainment of those who come to listen to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Illinois was entitled to recognition by the Chair, but as he was not present I addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In five minutes the Senator from Illinois will be entitled to recognition, and if he is then not present the Senator from Georgia is entitled to go on for 25 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. If he comes in, I will be glad to yield the floor; but if he does not, then I shall desire to proceed at some length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless the Senator from Illinois is here in five minutes, he will forfeit his time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, as I was remarking, the Senator from Iowa contended on Wednesday that the two questions of rates and wages were utterly dissimilar from a legal standpoint, from a constitutional standpoint. While it was possible, the Senator said, to set up a just and reasonable standard for railroad rates, it was utterly impossible, he said, to set up a just and reasonable standard for wages. The distinguished Senator called attention to the different character of work that men do, and he inquired why it was that a lawyer was paid $50 for a certain piece of work, while the carpenter on a given piece of work, involving a great deal more physical labor, only got $5. Mr. President, I undertook to answer the Senator then by saying to him that while it might be difficult to ascertain what were just and reasonable wages, yet it was no new proposition to attempt to determine what were just and reasonable wages for a given piece of service. The law of quantum meruit is as old as civilization itself; and, if men do not agree on wages, any court in the land, in proper proceedings, would undertake to fix what are just and reasonable wages for a certain service that is performed in the absence of an express contract between the parties. So I say that legally and constitutionally there is no difficulty in section 6 of the proposition submitted by the Senate committee.

We have the same power to delegate this question to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to say to that body, "You shall determine what are just and reasonable wages and what are just and reasonable conditions of labor," that we have to say to that body, "You shall determine what are just and reasonable freight or passenger rates, as the case may be, and what are just and reasonable regulations of railway traffic and the service incident thereto." It seems to me that the two things complement and supplement each other; that it is utter nonsense and inefficient and incomplete regulation to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission may fix the railroad rates throughout this country, may prescribe what are just and reasonable rates for the service that the railroads perform for the public, and yet to say that that same body ought not also have the power and ought not also to be charged with the duty of determining how much the railroads shall pay as compensation to the men who work thereon. The same body that regulates income ought to regulate outgo. There is no constitutional objection to it, and every reason of common sense argues most powerfully for it. As I said the other day on this floor, unless we are to have complete, efficient, well-rounded regulation of these great public-service corporations, then no thoughtful men can dispute the proposition that the day of Government ownership is at hand.

It seems to me, Mr. President, to be absolutely certain that the people of the United States are not going to submit to the proposition that the great public-service corporations of this country shall be operated as if they were private businesses. They have declined to submit to that proposition. When the question at issue was how much shall the railroads be allowed to charge for the service that they render, Congress stepped in, on that question, and said: "You are not engaged in a private business; you who are operating the railroads will not be allowed to charge the public whatever you please; you are engaged in a great public business, and we have a right, representing the people of this country, to say how much you shall charge the public for the service that you render to them." Now, I want to ask, in the name of reason, in the name of justice, in the name of common sense, why the Congress of the United States, representing the public, representing all the people, has not an equal right to say to these men: "You shall not be permitted literally to hold up this country whenever you want to do so in order to have the standard of wages set as high as you please on the threat that ruin will overtake the land unless your demands are granted."

Some of these men are the best friends I have ever had in my life, both personally and politically; and, as I know them, I do not believe that they, individually and personally, would sympathize with any such demand or would care to occupy any such position. But, Mr. President, representing 100,000,000 people, discharging a great public trust, it is the duty of this body, of every Senator of the United States, to say to these men just what he has said already to the railroads, and to be just as fair to capital as he is to labor; to be as just and as fair to labor, and no more so, than he has been to capital.

You have already said, each one of you, to capital: "We will not permit you to levy your charges unregulated and uncontrolled upon the public. We submit your charges to public regulation." We ought to say to labor: "We treat you just exactly like we treated capital—no differently. You shall not be permitted to levy your demands without control, without regulation, without any man to say you nay, upon the industries and business of this country and upon its teeming millions. You are not engaged in private service. You are not engaged in private business. You, just like the men who own the railroads, are engaged in a great public business. You are performing a great public service. If it is justice to require that the capitalist shall have his demands controlled by the strong arm of the law, it is also justice to say that the laboring man's demands shall also be controlled by the strong arm of the law."

The people of the American Republic are not willing, either now or later, to submit themselves, their businesses, their industries, their commerce, their interests—nay, their very life, financially and commercially speaking, at least, and maybe literally speaking—to the mercy of either side, in a great controversy of this kind.

Senators, there is not one of you on either side of this body, animated as I know each one of you is by a lofty conception of public service, who would be willing to say to either side in a great controversy like this: "You have the right to work your uncontrolled will upon 100,000,000 helpless people."

What then? What situation confronts us to-day? We are notified that a great strike, nation-wide, is impending; that four great organizations, with 400,000 of the most highly paid, the most highly efficient and the most highly organized workingmen in America in their ranks, have decreed that on Monday morning next at 7 o'clock the great interstate agencies of commerce and of transportation are to stop, stilled and useless, unable to operate, unable to perform their great functions, unless certain demands of these employees as to wages be met, and met before that time arrives.

So that it seems to me the Congress of the United States is almost literally held up. We are notified that we must pass certain legislation or commerce and industry and business in this country will halt. We are notified that we must require these railroads to make certain concessions or the very life of the Republic will be imperiled. So that we are shaping our law, not so much to meet the presidential approval in this case, not so much to invite the smile at the other end of the Avenue, as we are shaping our law, literally under force, under duress, under compulsion, in order to keep these highly organized workingmen from absolutely tying up the business and commerce and industry of the Republic.

Senators, it is not a situation that appeals to me. We are not meeting it in a manner or a method in which we ought to meet it, according to my humble judgment. If the railroads of this country had assumed any such position as that, we would not have listened to them one single minute. We would have acted so swiftly, so drastically, so thoroughly, that before 24 hours we would have wiped them off the map, as far as it could be done by legislation. And yet it seems that in the face of this situation, confronted by this dilemma, we are utterly helpless. We must enact, not the legislation that our judgment approves, not the legislation that our wills, our consciences, our minds as legislators and our self-respect as representatives of 100,000,000 people tell us is wise and necessary to meet the situation now and permanently, but we must enact such legislation, forsooth, as is necessary in order to avert the strike, and to avert it right away! In other words, we must pay the price, not out of the Public Treasury, nor yet out of the railroad treasuries, but out of the pockets of the people whose representatives we are, and without their consent, certainly without consulting them.

It may be, Mr. President, that a failure to enact proper legislation along these lines before this has rendered us for the moment helpless. It may be that we are forced to bow in sullen submission to demands of this character. If so, I submit to this body and to the American people that it is our bounden duty to provide a permanent system of laws by which neither the railroads, on the one hand, nor the workingmen, on the other, can literally hold up the people of the United States for as many advances in wages or for as many increases in dividends as greed on either side may suggest, now and as as often afterwards as either may desire. If we fail to do that, in my judgment we will have fallen far short of our duty as public servants and far short of our duty as the representatives of the people who sent us here.

I want to insist that one proposition embodied in the report of the Senate committee shall be adopted by this body; namely, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be given full and complete power to fix and determine what are just and reasonable wages and conditions and hours of labor for these employees, just as that body already fixes and determines what are just and reasonable rates for the railroads to charge to the public. I want to say in this connection, Mr. President, that while I am pleased with that part of the committee's report, I am not pleased that it does not go much further. I do not believe that without going further this body or the other House of Congress will meet the obligations that it owes to all the American people, to our constituents back home. Senators, only a small part of whom are directly interested in this controversy, but all of whom are indirectly, yea, are vitally interested in its outcome, and in what the future may hold for them in reference to this matter. Once we have submitted to an impartial, a well-organized, a well-equipped public-service commission the ascertainment of the facts as to what are just and reasonable wages, what are just and reasonable and humane labor conditions and hours of employment, I tell you we ought to go even further than anything in this bill has yet suggested.

We can not and ought not to undertake to deprive any individual in this Republic of his personal freedom and his individual liberty. Nay, we can not do it, even if we so desire; and no Senator on either side of this Chamber so desires, I know. But while we may not make it unlawful for any man to quit his employment if he is not satisfied with the wages that are allowed or with the terms and conditions of employment that are set up by the Interstate Commerce Commission, if power be conferred on that body, yet I contend we have the right, the undisputed legal right, the undoubted constitutional right, and that it is our solemn, bounden duty to all the people of this Republic, to every business and to every industry within its limits, once this impartial public board is given full legal authority to fix just and reasonable wages and humane and just hours and conditions of employment, to prescribe that thereafter it shall be unlawful for two or more men to combine or conspire to destroy or impair the efficiency of the great interstate agencies of commerce.

We can do it, just as we make it unlawful for men to interfere with the postal facilities of this Government. We can do it in the exercise of the highest sovereign rights. We can do it under that oft-cited and oft-stretched section of the Constitution which confers upon this body power to regulate commerce between the several States. Of what value is regulation that halts at that, regulation that stops short of that, regulation that hesitates first to provide a fair and reasonable way of determining justice toward these men, and, second, having provided that way, then fails to say that men shall not conspire to destroy great agencies of interstate commerce or to impair their efficiency?

It is our duty to do that. We will not discharge it if we do not adopt both propositions. We will not measure up to what is required of us unless we not only bridge over the emergency that now confronts us, but unless we provide a permanent plan by which and under which it will hereafter be impossible, through all time, as long as this Government shall last, for anybody, be he railroad magnate or railroad man, to seize this great Government of ours by the throat and to hold up its people for whatever legislation they want, whether our judgments approve it or not.
